Mr. CABELL. I want to ask, Mr. Speaker, a question in reference to that bill. It appears from the report made by the committee that this man has been a soldier in the confederate army; that he voluntarily entered the service in the confederate army, and was afterward a soldier in the Union Army. Now, if it is proposed to pay pensions to confederate soldiers, I want to see them paid to good ones, and not to such as he has shown himself to be.

Mr. RAINEY. I had the honor to report this bill to the House. The case of Mr. Duncan is simply this: He was an inhabitant of the State of Tennessee, living near the Cumberland Mountains. He was in the habit of guiding Union men across the mountains, for which his neighbors made certain reports against him. He and his two brothers were arrested to be taken to Knoxville, Tennessee, and while on their way he and one of his brothers made their escape; but a crippled brother was taken there and put in prison. His father, an aged man, was very much concerned about his crippled son and importuned one of the other brothers to go to Knoxville and see if he could procure the release of this crippled brother. William R. Duncan went to Knoxville and sought to procure the release of his brother. The condition upon which the brother would be released was that he himself should enlist in the confederate service. He did enlist, and at the expiration of ten days' time he made his escape. He returned to the Cumberland region, and raising a company of twenty-five men crossed the mountains, went into Kentucky and joined the Federal forces, and continued in service to the expiration of the war. While in service he contracted chronic diarrhea, as his physician says.

Now, inasmuch as this man entered the confederate service for the purpose of procuring the release of his crippled brother, and did so at the instance of his aged father, who as the testimony proves was a Union man as was this man, the committee instructed me to make a favorable report in the case.

Mr. PRATT. I did not fully understand the gentleman to state the cause of the man's arrest. Why was he arrested?

Mr. RAINEY. He was arrested because he was reported as having acted as a guide, which he admits was the case, to Union men escaping across the Cumberland Mountains into Kentucky. He himself was a Union man and was arrested for his Union sentiments.

Mr. PRATT. Does the gentleman say that there was proof before the committee that he enlisted in the confederate service only to obtain the release of his brother?

Mr. RAINEY. That proof is clear and beyond doubt.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Before the gentleman takes his seat I would like to inquire if he proposes to pension this man because he served in the confederate army or because he deserted from it?

Mr. RAINEY. We propose to reward him with a pension for his services in the Union Army. I have nothing to do with his services in the confederate army. This pension is proposed to be given because of the service he rendered the Union cause.

Mr. MORRISON. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this man made an engagement to serve in the confederate army for the purpose of securing the release of his brother and then broke that engagement?

Mr. RAINEY. He said that the condition upon which his brother would be released was that he himself should remain and, with certain Union prisoners, should enlist in the confederate service. He enlisted and then made his escape ten days after.

Mr. MORRISON. He entered the service to secure the release of his brother.

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. MORRISON. And having secured that he broke his pledge?

Mr. THORNBURGH. A pledge much better broken than kept.

Mr. MORRISON. A man who will break a pledge is a scoundrel anyway.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Lord Macaulay says that it may be right to pay money or perform a service to prevent a wrong, and as an illustration gives this example: A Salee robber threatens to bastinado a Christian to death unless he is paid a sum of money. It would, perhaps, be wrong to pay him any money to prevent him from doing what is wrong, but it is better to pay some money than have the man bastinadoed to death. I think the rule would apply in this case.

Mr. THORNBURGH. All the circumstances of the case have not been detailed by any of the gentlemen who have spoken, as I understand it, and I introduced the original bill. Gentlemen now can have no real idea of the fearful and terrible condition in which the loyal men of East Tennessee were placed in 1861 and 1862. This young man, then almost a boy, had this alternative presented to him, and he was urged by his aged father to accept it: either to leave his crippled brother in the hands of the enemy or to enlist in a company of Union soldiers in the confederate army, a company made up from Union prisoners. He preferred the alternative to enlist and then attempt to make his escape, and I, for one, have no desire to avoid that fact. At the earnest solicitation of his father, rather than leave his crippled brother in the hands of the enemy, to be sent South and possibly, as was the case in many other instances, to die in prison, this man enlisted with the distinct intention, as is proved throughout the whole case, of leaving the confederate service the moment he had an opportunity to do it.

I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] that there was no proof that this man was ever mustered into the confederate service.

Mr. MORRISON. I made no such allegation; but the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAINEY] so stated.

Mr. RAINEY. I said he had enlisted. That may imply mustering in.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MORRISON,] the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, puts this issue in such a shape that I think it a little important that the House should understand it. To a Union soldier whose record in the Union Army is good, and whose disability was incurred in that service, the gentleman proposes to refuse a pension because he deserted from a previous enlistment in the confederate army. I think I do not misstate the gentleman's position, for he said distinctly that a man who deserted from the confederate army after having enlisted under the circumstances named is "a scoundrel" and ought not to have a pension. I do not wish to misstate the gentleman's position; that is the way I understood him.

Mr. MORRISON. I do not propose that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] shall state a case for me. I will state my own case.

Mr. KASSON. I have not yielded the floor yet. The gentleman has stated the case in the way in which I have quoted it.

Mr. MORRISON. No, sir; I have not.

Mr. KASSON. The RECORD of to-morrow morning, if not corrected, will show that the position taken by the gentleman was this: That this man, having secured the release of his brother from a rebel prison by his own temporary enlistment, and then having failed to continue in the confederate army, having deserted, was a scoundrel—I think those were the words the gentleman used—and not entitled to anything.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that on this point I for one take distinct issue with the gentleman. This man is shown by this report to have incurred disability in the Union service, to have presented such proof of it that the Commissioner of Pensions granted him a pension, but afterward suspended that pension, (as he was authorized by law to do) because the fact came to light that the man had been temporarily in the confederate service. That is the case. This bill simply provides that the pension shall be restored notwithstanding the fact of his having been in the confederate service. Why? Because the man entered that service not to serve the confederacy but to accomplish a result lawful in war, and because the fact of his service under such circumstances ought not to stand as a bar against his pension.

Why, sir, have we not read, almost with tears in our eyes, instances of men's wives or sisters entering prisons and surreptitiously substituting themselves for their husbands or brothers to secure their escape from the enemy? And are we to be told now because a Union man, one who afterward became a Union soldier, got his brothre out of prison by playing a ruse upon the enemy that it is a violation of the laws of war and dishonors the man who did it? Sir, I protest against the doctrine. If the evidence is not satisfactory that this man enlisted for the purpose named, then let another result be arrived at; but if it is satisfactory, as the committee report, then I submit this man ought not to forfeit his pension.

Mr. MORRISON. I repeat that I do not allow the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] to state a case for me, and one upon assumption wholly. He does not know the time when I voted against pensioning a Union soldier.

I asked the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAINEY] whether I understood him correctly as saying that this man had entered the confederate service for the purpose of securing the release of his brother, and having secured that release broke faith, violated his pledge, oath, and obligation. I understood the gentleman to answer "yes." I knew nothing of the record of this man; nothing was said about it; and I said then, as I say now, that the man who enters into such an engagement with the intention or purpose of breaking it to secure the release of a prisoner, is not in my opinion such a man as ought to be pensioned, especially for that reason—because he breaks faith, and because he enters into this arrangement with the purpose of breaking it. If this man has a sufficient record to justify his receiving a pension for services thereafter rendered and disabilities incurred in such service, I have no objection to urge against his being pensioned.

Mr. THORNBURGH. He has complied with the pension laws and has already been pensioned, but the pension has been suspended.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I hope we shall not drift away from the general principles which are governing the action of this House and which governed the action of the last House. I understand the last House agreed, and I believe the proposition has been unanimously agreed to by the Pension Committee in this House, that service in the confederate army should not deprive a man of a pension to which he would otherwise be entitled. The Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812 have reported unanimously the same thing, and I hope we are going to pass it. I trust, too, that we shall try to be as good-natured as we can.

Now it has been said jocosely about the House that we are going so far into amnesty that pretty soon some of us would have to introduce a bill to remove the disabilities of any man that served in the Union Army! The remark was only made jocosely. I hope it will not be turned into a reality; for if so, then any member of this House who has served in the Union Army, when his history is to be published, will have to suppress the fact that he did serve in that Army. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRISON. Has the gentleman any reference to me when he talks about suppressing the record?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. My proposition was entirely general.

Mr. MORRISON. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. The gentleman desires to know what I said. I said this——

Mr. MORRISON. I ask the gentleman whether he had any reference to me?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I will tell the gentleman what I did say. I had not any reference to anybody. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRISON. Then that is all there is about it.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I did not mean that; I meant to say what will be the effect, and if it had any reference to the gentleman from Illinois he will know; I do not undertake to say. [Laughter.] I said if we should refuse a pension to this man because he served in the Union Army it would come to be the case when we came to publish our history we would have to suppress the fact that anybody had served in the Union Army. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRISON. The gentleman evades and quibbles, and I have no further reply to make to him.

As the case is stated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CABELL] in reference to the record of this man, I have no sort of objection to his being pensioned. The response I made to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAINEY] in reference to this case was upon the statement from him as I understood it.

Mr. DE BOLT. I know nothing about the record of this man only as it has been stated by gentlemen heretofore. My position in regard to pensions I will briefly state. It is this: No matter if this man had been in the confederate service, no matter about his desertion of that service, if he entered the service of the United States and in that service contracted disease whereby he was disabled and is suffering to-day, or was wounded, he is thereby entitled to a pension, notwithstanding his former service in the confederate army. That does not enter into this case. The only question I think for that committee and for this House to decide is whether or not he received his disability in the service of the United States, and if he did, I say he is entitled to a pension and ought to have it. I hope the House will give it to him by passing this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to be very apparent, Mr. Speaker, from the explanations made, that this soldier was pensioned on account of disability incurred in the service of the United States after this desertion. That seems very clear, and the committee have put the case upon the ground, under the circumstances, that he is entitled to pension. And he certainly is. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia, who desires for a moment to make an explanation.

Mr. CABELL. Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to say in explanation that I had no idea of interposing any objection to the pensioning of any good Union soldier. I will be as ready as any gentleman on this or the other side of the House in proper cases to vote for bills pensioning men true to the country and who served it, although I was opposed to them in the late war. But it was stated in the report from the committee that this man had been dropped from the rolls. In addition, it was stated that he had been in the confederate army and had sworn as such. It was a serious question, therefore, whether or not a man of that character ought to be pensioned by this Government. It was no matter by whom he was dropped; he was dropped from the rolls, and there must have been, I think, some good reason for it. I deemed that a sufficient cause of objection, so as to bring the matter again before the House and let them determine whether or not this man was a fit subject to receive a pension. He had absolutely been dropped from the rolls by the Commissioner of Pensions after he had been put upon them as a pensioner.

The bill was passed.

PRIVATE BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were separately ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time and passed:

A bill (H. R. No. 1600) granting a pension to Jane A. Harris;

A bill (H. R. No. 1601) granting a pension to Otis B. Anderson;

A bill (H. R. No. 154) granting a pension to Edward C. Wheelock;

A bill (H. R. No. 1602) granting a pension to Margaret E. Cogburn; and

A bill (H. R. No. 318) granting a pension to Annie Farley.

The bill (H. R. No. 1599) granting a pension to Frances C. Elliott.

The following bills were reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments, and with the recommendation that, as amended, the bills do pass:

A bill (H. R. No. 193) for the relief of Ezra B. Barrett;

A bill (H. R. No. 215) granting a pension to John G. Parr, of Kittanning, Pennsylvania; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1044) granting a pension to Margaret E. West.

The amendments were severally agreed to; and the bills, as amended, were ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOSKINS moved to reconsider the various votes by which bills reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar had been passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. MORRISON. I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow's session be for debate only in Committee of the Whole on the President's message, no business whatever to be transacted.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I object.

Mr. MORRISON. Then I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I move that the House do now adjourn.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, before putting the motion to adjourn, will lay before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in response to a House resolution of the 6th ultimo, a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs respecting certain Indian agents.

The message and accompanying communication were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. CHAPIN indefinitely on account of important business.

MELVILLE W. HUDSON.

On motion of Mr. WOODWORTH, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Melville W. Hudson.

DISTRICT 3.65 BONDS.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask that, by unanimous consent, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of said commissioners, and for other purposes, with amendments by the Senate, be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the amendments of the Senate may be reported to the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after line 12 to the end of the resolution, and insert the following:

That any further issue of 3.65 bonds under or by virtue of said act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, is hereby prohibited: And provided, That the certificates heretofore issued by the board of audit, including those converted into 3.65 per cent. bonds, and those which have not been so converted, and the certificates hereafter to be issued by the board of audit, or their successors in office, shall not exceed in the aggregate the sum of $15,000,000.

Add the following section:

SEC. 2. That there shall be no increase of the present amount of the total indebtedness of the District of Columbia; and any officer or person who shall knowingly increase or aid or abet in increasing such total indebtedness shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding ten years, and by fine not exceeding $10,000: Provided, That the board of audit, created by the act for the government of the District of Columbia approved June 20, 1874, is hereby abolished, and shall, immediately upon the approval of this resolution, transmit all the books and property in their possession belonging to the District to the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and make a report of their proceedings not hitherto made: And provided further, That this resolution shall not in any way or manner recognize the liability of the United States to pay either the principal or interest of any of such bonds as may have been issued on or since the 27th day of January, 1876.

There being no objection, the joint resolution with the Senate amendments were referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution and amendments were referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STEAMERS PHILO PARSONS AND ISLAND QUEEN.

Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1812) relative to the steamers Philo Parsons and Island Queen; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. PIPER, by unanimous consent, presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, in relation to Chinese immigration; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. PIPER. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be also printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection; and it was so ordered.

The resolution is as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution No. 7, asking a modification of our treaty with China:

Whereas it is the duty of the General Government to promote the welfare of its citizens by the enactment of wise laws and to advance their material interests by treaties of friendship and commerce with foreign nations by conceding to their subjects such rights as they allow our citizens to enjoy in their territories; and whereas our present treaty with China grants to her subjects privileges for which in return we receive no corresponding advantages, but which bring to our shores large numbers of her people, many of whom come among us to pursue an immoral vocation which has made certain quarters of our towns and cities localities where human degradation is seen in its most abhorrent forms; and whereas the laboring element that is brought among us from China by organized companies of capitalists is not of a desirable character as residents, because, owing to the low standard of living on which it can subsist, it deprives our own working people of employment in industries which they have learned only by a long apprenticeship; and whereas pauper wages for our working-classes, who have wives and children depending on them for support, result from the maintenance of the treaty with China, which largely contributes to fill our poor-houses and hospitals with unwilling inmates as the only shelter they can obtain from poverty and sickness caused by loss of work; and whereas it is against public policy that under any pretext whatever encouragement should be given, by treaty stipulations or otherwise, to the immigration of a servile laboring element among us. Therefore,

Be it resolved by the senate, the assembly concurring, That our Senators be instructed and our Representatives requested to use their influence to have articles 5 and 6 of our treaty with China modified so as to discourage the further immigration of Chinese to our shores by appropriate action on the part of the Federal Government.

Resolved, That his excellency the governor be requested to forward a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolution to our Senators and Representatives in Congress at as early a day as possible.

B. F. TUTTLE,
President of the Senate.
G. J. CARPENTER,
Speaker of the Assembly.

Senate concurrent resolution number seven (7.) Passed the senate January 10, 1876.

ELLISON L. CRAWFORD,
Assistant Secretary of the Senate.

Passed the assembly January 20, 1876.

ROBERT FERRAL,
Clerk of the Assembly.

This resolution was received by the governor this 24th day of January, 1876.

[SEAL.] E. W. MASLIN,
Private Secretary of the Governor.

PENSIONS.

Mr. PIPER also, by unanimous consent, presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, in relation to pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

HARRIET LEONARD.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1813) granting a pension to Harriet Leonard; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL SHEAFFER.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1814) granting a pension to Samuel Sheaffer; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

EASTERN BAND OF CHEROKEE INDIANS.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 59) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to pay to the eastern band of Cherokee Indians $2,500 out of funds heretofore appropriated; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

TAXES WRONGFULLY ASSESSED.

Mr. TUCKER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1815) for the relief of certain citizens of Lynchburgh, Virginia, against whom internal-revenue taxes have been wrongfully assessed and collected; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SECTION 1218 REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. TUCKER also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1816) to repeal section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The motion of Mr. THORNBURGH was then agreed to.

And accordingly (at four o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday next.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BELL: The petitions of citizens of Nashua, of Peterborough, and of Manchester, New Hampshire, for the repeal of the stamp-tax on safety matches, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. BLAIR: The petition of 30 divisions of the Sons of Temperance of New Hampshire, signed by the officers thereof, for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the same committee.

By Mr. WILLIS: The petition of A. Sheldon & Co. and 500 other merchants and business men of Detroit, Michigan, for the repeal of the bankrupt law, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WOODWORTH: The petition of Jonah Woodward, that his name be restored to the pension-rolls, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 7, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to a resolution of the Senate of January 26, 1876, requesting the Secretary of the Treasury to submit copies of any propositions by the Pacific railroads for the creation of a sinking fund for the redemption of the Government mortgages, together with a statement of the action of the Government thereon and the reasons therefor.

Mr. WEST. I desire to make a motion that the communication be printed and lie on the table; and I give notice to the Senate that at an early day I will call it up for reference and submit some remarks with regard to the pecuniary and other relations existing between the Pacific railroad companies and the Government of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will lie on the table and be printed, if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the course proposed by the Senator from Louisiana, but I wish to enter a motion to refer the communication to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WEST. I also wish to give notice that I shall move the reference of the communication to the Committee on Railroads.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio gives notice that he will move to take the communication from the table for reference to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WEST. I had already given notice of an intention to move the reference of the communication. Probably the Senator from Ohio did not hear me.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to enter a motion to refer. It will lie on the table for the present.

Mr. WEST. Let it lie on the table, and when it comes up the motions for reference can be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will lie on the table and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, stating that Major William P. Craighill, of the Corps of Engineers, will be detailed to make an examination of, and report upon, the present condition as respects safety and permanency of the Aqueduct bridge across the Potomac River at Georgetown, District of Columbia, under the resolution of the Senate of February 3; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. McCREERY. I present the petition of Martinette Hardin McKee, who asks for an appropriation sufficient to transport the remains of her late husband from the Panama cemetery to that at the city of Frankfort, Kentucky. Alexander R. McKee was born at Lancaster, Kentucky, where he filled several positions of trust with fidelity. He was married at Jacksonville, Illinois, to the daughter of Martin D. Hardin, once a member of this body. There he became the warm personal and political friend of Abraham Lincoln, who appointed and re-appointed him consul to Panama, where he died in the discharge of his duty. On the face of the paper I find statements from the governor, secretary of state, and the auditor of Kentucky. Piety, in all ages, has sought to consecrate the last resting-place of the dead. Every country is willing to accord at least an honored grave to those who have fallen in its service; but it is from the shrine of domestic affection that the purest incense rises to the memory of the loved and the lost; and it is in deference to that sentiment that I offer the petition, and commend it to the tender care of the proper committee—the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That reference will be made.

Mr. ALLISON presented a memorial and joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Iowa, in reference to the improvement of the navigation of the Upper Mississippi River; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

Whereas the Mississippi River and its tributaries afford to the people who dwell in their valleys the most available means to escape the exacting and oppressive tariffs on the transportation of their products to the markets of the world; and whereas in order to make this great national highway answer the full measure of its usefulness in affording greater facilities and safer passage for vessels of larger tonnage, it is of the utmost importance that the work on the rapids of the Upper and Lower Mississippi should be speedily completed: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives be requested to advocate and vote for in Congress such measures as will most speedily and successfully secure this result.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be directed to forward copies of this preamble and resolution to the President of the Senate of the United States and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, with a request that they may be laid before each House of Congress, and that copies be sent to each Senator and member of Congress from this State.

JOHN H. GEAR,
Speaker of the House.
J. G. NEWBOLD,
President of the Senate.

Approved January 25, 1876.

SAMUEL J. KIRKWOOD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial and joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Iowa, instructing the Senators and Representatives in Congress from that State to vote for and advocate legislation in favor of the improvement of the rapids of the Upper Mississippi and the completion of the work; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of W. E. Robbins and 200 others of Sullivan and Tioga Counties, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to pass an act allowing the people to elect the President by a direct vote of the people; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of New York, demonstrating the inexpediency of attempting resumption before the requisite conditions are ripe for it; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of John S. Friend, praying remuneration for property taken from him by the Comanche Indians in Texas in 1867 and 1868; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a petition of Robert Manville, of Indiana, praying that he may be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WINDOM presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota in favor of the establishment of a mail-route from Freeborn, in Freeborn County, by way of the village of Alden and the town of Mansfield, in that county, to Lake Mills, in Winnebago County, Iowa, with semi-weekly service thereon; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, in favor of the establishment of a mail-route from Dover Centre, Olmstead County, to Chatfield, Fillmore County, Minnesota, with daily mail service thereon; and also for an increase of service to tri-weekly on route from Preston to Greenleafton, in Fillmore County; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. WEST presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, in favor of an appropriation by Congress for the construction of levees on the Mississippi River in Louisiana, and for the General Government to assume control of all the levees in Louisiana; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Levees of the Mississippi River.

Mr. BOOTH presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, in favor of a modification of the treaty with China; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, in favor of the passage of an act granting pensions to the soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Mexican war of 1846, 1847, and 1848; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SARGENT. I present the petition of leading merchants in San Francisco, the signatures of whom I recognize as being men eminent in their business, in which they pray for the passage of Senate bill No. 209, introduced by myself some time since, to amend and supplemental to an act creating the court of commissioners of Alabama claims and for the disposition of certain moneys, approved June 23, 1874. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CRAGIN presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of New Hampshire, in favor of the resumption of specie payments; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of citizens of Missouri, praying for the repeal of the two-cent stamp tax on bank-checks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented the petition of Henry Lull, praying an extension of his patent for a shutter-hinge; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented the petition of citizens of Vineland, New Jersey, praying for the repeal of the resumption act; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONKLING presented a report and resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, reviewing the history and creation of the Japanese indemnity fund, and recommending that, with its accumulations, after expenses being deducted, it be paid back to the government of Japan; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the petition of J. J. Waller and others, praying the repeal of the two-cent stamp tax on checks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WALLACE presented a petition of citizens of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, engaged in the business of local expressmen, praying for the refunding of an internal-revenue tax of 3 per cent. on their gross receipts, levied under section 103, acts of June 30, 1864, and July 13, 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented the memorial of A. D. Reynolds, of Patrick County, Virginia, setting forth that the United States is indebted to him in the sum of $6,292.62 for cotton seized by United States officials during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of citizens of Williamson County, Illinois, praying for the passage of a law granting a pension to Eliza Mandrel, of Attila, Williamson County, widow of George W. Mandrel, deceased, late private One Hundred and Tenth Illinois Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Carter Wilkey, of Hamilton County, Illinois, praying a pension for services rendered as a private in the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOWE presented a resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of the erection of a custom-house, post-office, and other public buildings at Green Bay, Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PADDOCK presented the petition of several citizens of the counties of Otoe and Cass, in the State of Nebraska, praying the establishment of a mail-route from Unadilla, on the Nebraska Railway, to the South Bend Railroad, via Elmwood; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. ENGLISH presented the petition of Clarke & Given, coal merchants, of Washington, District of Columbia, and accompanying papers, praying compensation for fuel furnished the city schools of the District during the winters of 1873 and 1874; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. McMILLAN presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, in favor of the establishment of a post-route and mail service thereon from Hastings, in Dakota County, Minnesota, to Cannon Falls, in Goodhue County, via Bellwood and Douglas; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition signed by a large number of merchants of Saint Paul and Minneapolis, praying for a modification of the provisions of sections 2990, 2991, and 2997 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relative to the entry and transportation of foreign goods to ports of final destination without appraisel at ports of first arrival, so that the privileges accorded to certain enumerated ports by virtue of section 2997 as aforesaid be extended to the port of Saint Paul, Minnesota; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial signed by a large number of citizens of Minnesota, remonstrating against the passage of a bill making provision for the erection of a ponton bridge across the Mississippi River by the Green Bay and Minnesota Railroad Company at Winona; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

BRIDGE AT WINONA.

Mr. HOWE. I thought I heard the Senator from Minnesota offer a remonstrance to the bill providing for the construction of a bridge at Winona. There is a bill for that purpose, authorizing the Green Bay and Minnesota Railroad to construct a bridge. To settle the controversy, I now move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of that bill and that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will observe that the Senator who introduced the bill is not in his seat, the colleague [Mr. WINDOM] of the Senator from Minnesota who presented the remonstrance——

Mr. McMILLAN. I think the Senator from Wisconsin introduced the bill.

Mr. HOWE. I think I offered the bill myself, but I am not certain about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin moves that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. No. 64) to authorize the construction of a ponton bridge across the Mississippi River from some feasible point in Buffalo County, in the State of Wisconsin, to some feasible point in Winona County, in the State of Minnesota.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin moves that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred five petitions of citizens of New York, late soldiers of New York regiments in the late war, praying the amendment of the pension laws so as to extend the time for making application for arrears of pensions to July 4, 1876, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. HAMILTON. I am also instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Charles G. Bennett, late sergeant Company D, Fiftieth New York Engineers, praying for an additional allowance of pension, to report it back adversely. The committee find from the papers that there is no claim pending before the Commissioner of Pensions, and therefore ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 223) granting a pension to Ira Foster, a private in the war of 1812, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 35) equalizing pensions of certain officers, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. MERRIMON. The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 101) explanatory of the act passed June 20, 1874, have directed me to report it adversely, and instruct me to say that in respect to the points embraced in the bill the act is clear, and the proper construction has been placed upon it by the commissioners. The committee, therefore, deem it unwise to change the act, and they ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the bill.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MERRIMON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the petition of Clarke & Given, coal merchants in the city of Washington, praying compensation for fuel furnished the schools of the District during the winters of 1873 and 1874, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 153) to grant the right of way for railroad purposes through the United States arsenal grounds near Benicia, California, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Nathan Kunkle praying for the removal of the charge of desertion against him and for back pay and bounty, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Simon Wagenhauser, late private Company D, Fifty-ninth Regiment New York State Volunteers, praying to be allowed a bounty, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of James V. Boughnar, of West Virginia, praying the confirmation of title to certain lands and the issue of a patent therefor, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution of the Legislature of West Virginia in favor of an appropriation of $200,000 for the reconstruction and repair of the turnpike road leading from Fairmount, Marion County, to Gauley Bridge, in Fayette County, in that State, taken possession of and used by the United States authorities during the late war, for the transportation of supplies thereon to the Army, reported adversely thereon and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution of the Legislature of West Virginia in favor of an appropriation for the erection of a monument near the junction of the Ohio and Kanawha Rivers, in commemoration of the battle of Point Pleasant, fought October 10, 1774, reported adversely thereon and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

JUDGMENTS OF ALABAMA CLAIMS COMMISSION.

Mr. CONKLING. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1053) providing for the payment of judgments rendered under section 11 of chapter 459 of the laws of the Forty-third Congress, direct me to report the same back favorably with two verbal amendments. I incline to think, although I do not feel called upon to make the request in regard to it, that if the Senate would hear this bill read, it might be the pleasure of the Senate to consider it now. I will add to that remark one other, by leave of the Chair. The Senate will remember that under the act of Congress as it stood on the 22d of January, now passed, an end would have come to the existence and proceedings of the Alabama claims commission. Upon the arrival of that date, those in whose favor awards had been made, or judgments, as I will call them for convenience, would have had them certified to the State Department, and the Department would have taken action which would have enabled them to receive the money. When we assembled at this session it turned out that there remained for that commission labors which could not well be concluded by the 22d of January, and therefore upon the report of the Judiciary Committee a bill was passed prolonging the duration of the commission, making no change whatever, leaving everything in statu quo. The effect of that legislation was to defer until the 22d of July next that proceeding which otherwise would have occurred on the 22d of January.

The whole purpose of this bill is to provide that, notwithstanding that postponement, the claimants whose claims have been adjudicated may receive them as they would have done had this prolongation of the commission not occurred. That, I believe, is the whole scope of the bill; and unless there be some objection to it, I suggest that it be considered now.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

It is a direction to the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, as soon after the 22d of January, 1876, as may be practicable, to report to the Secretary of State the several judgments which, before or on that day, shall be rendered by the court pursuant to section 11 of chapter 459 of the laws of the Forty-third Congress; and also after the 22d of July, 1876, in like manner, report to the Secretary of State the several judgments it shall render from the 22d of January to and including the 22d day of July.

When a report shall be made, the Secretary of State is to transmit the same, or a copy thereof, to the Secretary of the Treasury, who is without unnecessary delay to proceed, pursuant to the chapter cited, to pay the judgments specified therein, with interest on the principal at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum from the date of loss, as certified, until the Secretary of the Treasury shall give notice for payment.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment of the committee was in section 1 line 7, to strike out the word "be" and insert the words "have been;" so as to read:

The several judgments which, before or on that day, shall have been rendered by the said court, &c.

Mr. CONKLING. That is merely because the day is past already.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. There is no other amendment except the title.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. SARGENT. Has the bill passed the stage for amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not. The bill is now in the Senate, and the question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SARGENT. I would like to make a suggestion to the committee, whether the interest of 4 per cent. ought not to be 6 per cent. That was the amount which was allowed by the Geneva tribunal, and the only object, I understand, in making the rate 4 per cent. in our original act was that there probably was not enough money to go around, or there was a fear there might not be. Consequently the original legislation provided that the judgments should be paid pro rata in case there was not sufficient to pay them all. It now seems, after these claims have passed into judgment, that one-half the fund at least, or a very large proportion of it, will be left unabsorbed and open to the claims of other claimants. It seems to me only justice that the low rate of 6 per cent. should be allowed. I do not know whether this matter was considered by the committee or not; but I desire to submit a motion to strike out "4" and insert "6" per cent. I make that motion.

Mr. CONKLING. Before the Senator submits his motion, I beg him to hear me a moment. I have no doubt he favors the object of the bill, and therefore I venture to suggest to him that he is interposing a matter foreign here, which can be considered otherwise, and which will lead to difficulties as well as to delay. The 4 per cent., of which the Senator from California speaks, was designed originally not only to cover such a difficulty as he has suggested, but also to pay the expenses, or contribute to the expenses of this tribunal. It so stands in the law. It was deemed by the two Houses of Congress adequate at the time. The whole purpose of this bill is to correct the postponement of the realization of the claims which occurred from the act to which reference has been made; and the Senator from California will see that if he introduces the amendment he now proposes, he opens a pretty large question, which extends to the whole of this fund, which revives the original considerations that were disposed of by Congress, and which will not only defer, but I suggest to him very likely defeat either the ultimate passage of this bill, or more especially its passage at the particular time when it will be most valuable. And as bearing upon the last suggestion, let me state to the Senator from California and to the Senate this fact: These claimants expected, had a right to expect, that on the 22d of January they would realize this money; they had a right to rely upon it as a certainty; they did; they made their calculations accordingly. Unexpectedly to them, and suddenly, the postponement which I have twice stated occurred. Their wish is simply to be permitted to avail themselves of this act. They do not ask, as I understand, by petition or otherwise, anything on the interest question; they want to be put back where they were but for this postponement.

In that view I suggest to my friend, that as other bills touching this fund will almost certainly be before the Senate presently, he will have an opportunity, on an occasion which would put at less peril rights and merits of claimants, to present his question; and therefore in the interest of the bill, (and I know he shares in my interest in that regard,) I suggest to him not to offer this amendment now, but to let this House bill go, and consider that hereafter.

Mr. SARGENT. I am not half convinced by the Senator's statement. I see no reason why 6 per cent. interest should not be allowed and why it should be contested upon the principle that we restricted it to 4 per cent. I know many of these claimants of small claims desire interest to be paid. I know it by applications made by many to myself. Some other bill may come up relating to some other matter, for example, the question relating to the insurance companies absorbing this fund, and to suggest that we go back and consider the interest question then would be met by the argument that it was foreign on such a bill as that. Here is a proposition to pay them and to settle up with them entirely; and why not pay them 6 per cent. instead of 4 per cent? As I say, there are a number of small claims where the expenses which we have required these parties to be at in taking and printing testimony under the rules of the court are equal to and, in some cases called to my attention, exceed the amount which they can get from this tribunal, and I think we ought to allow to these parties the reasonable expense of taking and printing their testimony; I do not say their counsel fees or anything of the kind.

I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate by discussing the proposition. I would like, however, to have a vote upon my amendment that this interest be increased to 6 per cent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the Senate in the verbal amendment made in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from California, in section 3 line 6 to strike out "4" and insert "6;" so as to read:

With interest on the principal at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think that ought to be done. One theory upon which the original bill was passed providing 4 per cent. was that this money being paid over to the United States would lie in the Treasury without any interest at all, in its normal condition; but in order to have it carry some interest and do good to these people we proposed to pay interest, as much as the United States could afford to pay as a depositor—rather more—because we only paid 3 per cent in old times upon mere deposits. Now, the 4 per cent. the United States pays out of the Treasury because we have not done with the fund yet and we do not know what will become of it. As it now stands, the 4 per cent. the United States pays is really the amount we are paying to this fund for the use of the money by the Treasury, which has been put into a bond; so that I submit to my friend from California the case does not stand on the principle that the money is worth 6 per cent.; it stands upon the principle, so far as that part of it is concerned, that 4 per cent. is as much percentage as the United States can afford to pay for a short loan of this kind, and it has been put into a bond accordingly. That is the point; and therefore I do not think we ought to disturb it, certainly until we see by and by where we are going to land about the whole business.

Mr. WRIGHT. Before the vote is taken I wish to say one thing upon the question itself and also with reference to the bill. At the time we passed the original bill, as the provisions within it show, it was contemplated that this money should be paid out after all the claims were adjudicated. Whether we held this money strictly in trust or whatever our relations to the fund, at all events it was regarded that we had so much money to be paid out to the persons who were entitled to it. Now, whether there would be enough to pay all or only to pay them pro rata we did not know; and hence the original bill provided that the entire amount due should be ascertained, and when ascertained and the commission had concluded their work then they should certify to the Secretary of State the amount, and the amount should be paid; and if the fund was not sufficient to pay all, the respective claimants should be paid pro rata.

By the original bill it was contemplated that the commission should close its work on the 22d of January. It seems it was not able to do that, and we extended the time to the 22d of July, in no manner however changing the provisions of the former statute with reference to paying to claimants pro rata if we had not sufficient to pay all. It may be as the law stands now that we shall have sufficient and more than sufficient to pay all claims that may be allowed. But there are claimants knocking at the door of Congress, whether as insurers or those who claim that they should be let into an allowance; and what will be our legislation between this and the 22d of July, no one can tell. If it shall occur that, under the law as it stands now and the law as we shall change it, a larger amount shall be allowed; then the fund at our disposal, if we pass this bill now and provide that the claimants shall be paid who have been allowed, and a larger amount shall be allowed between this and the 22d day of July than we have of the fund remaining to pay, then they must either be paid pro rata or we must take from the Treasury of the United States sufficient to pay them in full, as we propose to pay those in full that have been allowed up to this time; and therefore I have been in favor and am in favor yet of leaving this matter until the 22d of July or until the work is concluded before we provide for the payment of any of them. In other words, the law as we originally passed it went upon the theory that the 4 per cent. allowed was sufficient to these persons for the delay occurring. We said that was the interest they ought to be paid. I do not believe in increasing that interest now if they are to be paid. We considered that matter carefully, and after due deliberation determined that 4 per cent. was what they should be paid. It was known then as well as it is now that these persons would be put to expense in obtaining the allowance of their claims; and to increase this to 6 per cent. now I think would be in the face of the statute and in the face of the deliberate action of the Senate when the law was passed.

But, to return, I say that 4 per cent. was what we agreed was a fair interest to be paid these persons for the delay incident upon the allowance of their claims. If they shall be delayed until next July, it will only be a delay of a few months, and I think it is better that this whole fund should be held until the commission conclude their work and we know what we have to pay in the aggregate, instead of paying it out by piece-meal and running the hazard, as we shall, that the allowances between now and the time when the fund shall be all disposed of will more than absorb or take it up, and we have to pay the balance out of the Treasury. I think the true theory is that these persons, if there is not sufficient to pay all, should be paid pro rata. At present, if we pass this bill and pay these persons we may be compelled to pay those who come in afterward pro rata or pay them from the Treasury instead of from the fund itself.

For these reasons I am opposed to this bill. I am opposed to the increase of interest because it is in the face of the deliberate action of Congress heretofore. I think 4 per cent. was the amount that we agreed upon as the fair interest, and I see no reason for changing it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I should like to know from the committee whether there are not two elements in the question of interest; whether it is not true, probably, from the report of the proceedings at Geneva that the tribunal there gave at least 6 per cent. interest upon the losses from the time the losses were incurred until the award was made at Geneva.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not so understand it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It has been some time since I examined the proceedings, but I certainly came to the conclusion that the tribunal at Geneva allowed interest. Whether they were governed by the rate of interest in England or in this country, it is clear that they must have allowed more than 4 per cent. Therefore, while I admit that from the time of the award at Geneva until the time when the claimants are paid 4 per cent. would be a reasonable sum, I think that if we can ascertain what rate of interest was allowed by the tribunal at Geneva, that rate ought to be allowed to claimants whose claims have been ratified by the commission from the time when the losses were incurred until the award was rendered at Geneva. Whether this is the proper time or not for such a provision, as the case now stands, I shall feel inclined to sustain the motion made by the Senator from California.

Mr. STEVENSON. I understand that the Geneva tribunal did allow 6 per cent. I understand that the 4 per cent. perhaps was allowed in the law because the Government had incurred some expense in regard to this matter; but whether this fund is amply sufficient to pay all the claims will depend upon the future action of the Senate as to what claims not yet adjudicated upon will be admitted for consideration. There are a great many litigated questions yet to come up.

I am opposed to this bill because I think we ought not to allow any judgments to be paid until the whole fund has been adjudicated on so far as the payments go, and those who are postponed will draw their 4 per cent. It is simply an innovation on the custom in the adjudication of claims by mixed boards or commissions to allow payment in parcels. The usual practice is always to let all the claims be adjudicated upon before paying any. Those claims that have already been adjudicated upon, and which will be paid on the 22d day of January, will draw their 4 per cent. Let that 4 per cent. go on, and let this board finish its adjudications, and let us see how the fund will be distributed, who will obtain indemnity and who will not; and so it seems to me to be the safer way to defer all payments until the full adjudication has been had.

If you allow this bill to pass, and a portion of these claimants obtain payment of their judgments, it may hereafter turn out that the whole Geneva fund will not be sufficient to pay claims which will be hereafter adjudicated upon; and if such should be the case, those who are entitled to valid claims will come upon the Government to make good their deficit. I hope the bill will not pass.

Mr. CONKLING. In reply to the Senator from Kentucky, I beg to suggest that every claim which can be paid under the proposed bill is a claim to which nobody has ever objected. In all the conjectures and alternatives which have occurred touching the disposition of this fund, no man in Congress or not in Congress has ever argued that these claimants did not stand in the fore-front, because their losses occurred in such wise that within the most restricted limits the award pointed to them. So much as to the general objection of the Senator from Kentucky about paying. In any event their claims are to be undisputed.

The Senator from Massachusetts says, if this is a proper time or the proper time to consider the question of interest, then he will be inclined to favor the amendment. In reply to that, I beg the Senator's attention to this truth: Every provision in this act is the law now, every one, with all its limitations and all its opportunities to consider the question of interest; and the whole effect of this act is to make the 22d of January last, in lieu of the 22d of July next, the day as of which claimants may call for their money. If there will be after the passage of this act any difficulty in reviving the interest question, that difficulty exists now, not in this proposed bill, but in the statute tantamount in all regards to this, except, as I say, that this bill proposes to allow these people to enjoy their money in place of being deferred to a day which, although not long future, is far future to those who are in need, and who certainly relied upon being able to command this money when the 22d of January should come as much as they relied upon being able to draw their checks upon a bank balance if they had a balance in bank. To them it is a grievous matter and an important matter; and all the bill proposes to do, I repeat, is simply to name one day in lieu of another day, which has grown out of our own interposition, as the day on which they may realize their money.

Now the Senator from Massachusetts must see that no stumbling-block will be put in the way of reviving the question of interest by passing this bill. The Senator from California will see the same thing. They encounter now every objection they can encounter after this act is passed. If that be true, and if these Senators concede the justice of allowing these parties to reap the fruits of their adjudication, what is the occasion of interposing the question of interest here? Why not allow them to take their money; and, if they or anybody else choose hereafter to raise the question of the rate of interest, that question, I repeat, cannot be disparaged at all by the passage of this bill or aided at all by the defeat of the bill, should the lapse of the morning hour or anything else prevent its passage.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am inclined to agree with the Senator from New York that it is more in the interest of the claimants to take what this bill allows and trust to some future occasion for the additional interest.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Lest there should be a general impression that the Geneva tribunal allowed 6 per cent. as some Senator has stated he understands it to have done, I wish to say that at the session when this principal act was passed, from the most careful examination I could make of the published records and from certain private information that I had, I had the best reason for believing that the tribunal did not allow 6 per cent. or anything like it, but a very much less rate. In point of real fact, I believe that, in the sense of computing interest, the tribunal did not allow any interest at all as such. They took into consideration the circumstance that there had been a long delay, but the general average of their opinions as to what the principal gross amount of the injury was, settled down to a sum which, making a reasonable allowance, without its being exactly computed, made up the sum total of the fifteen and a half millions. Therefore, Mr. President, I do not think we ought to proceed, now at any rate, upon the idea that the tribunal at Geneva allowed 6 per cent. or any other considerable sum as interest. Certainly whatever might have been attributable to the delay was much less than 6 per cent.

Mr. SARGENT. I am inclined, after this discussion, to agree with the Senator from Massachusetts, that perhaps it is better for these claimants that they have allowed this amount under this bill; but I wish to say that individually, at some favorable time hereafter, when legislation is pending which shall give the opportunity, I shall again present this question and contend that it is just that 6 per cent. be allowed to these claimants. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to say just one word. In reference to the matter of interest I believe it to be true that this board in allowing the claim of each claimant included the interest, so that at the time the judgment was rendered in favor of each one they allowed so much for the original claim with interest added.

Mr. CONKLING. That we can ascertain in future.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to say one thing more in reference to the merits of the bill. It is suggested by the Senator from New York that the claims proposed to be paid by this bill belong to a class as to which there has been no controversy, that all persons inside and outside everywhere agree that these persons ought to be paid. Now, Mr. President, if it shall occur by our legislation hereafter that another class of persons are to be paid, then, whether all persons shall agree to it or not, we shall have to pay them; and therefore it is a matter of entire unimportance whether all persons are agreed to this or not, or whether all persons shall be agreed to the claims that shall hereafter come in or not. When we say they shall they will, and we shall have to pay them.

My objection to this legislation is that it proposes to pay these persons in advance, when I think that according to the theory of this award, the theory of our legislation, and the principle on which it stands, they should be paid pro rata if we have not sufficient to pay them all; and we cannot tell whether we have enough to pay them all until we get the entire award. I do not believe in doing it in piecemeal. I believe in ascertaining the entire amount, and it is better that we thus wait, even if there shall be wrong or injury in individual cases, than to interfere with this general rule and thereby increase the chances of being compelled to pay out of the Treasury of the United States a sum of money the amount of which no one can ascertain now.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I simply wish to say, Mr. President, that I hope this bill will pass. Both Houses of Congress have agreed that this class of claimants shall be paid in advance. That was the bill that passed both Houses.

Mr. INGALLS. Can the Senator inform us what amount of this class of claims has been awarded already by the commission?

Mr. CONKLING. A little more than $2,000,000, I understand.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think it is considerably more than that; but it leaves a very large surplus. Judgment has been rendered in favor of these claimants, and they certainly ought to be paid. It is only to correct the effect which our alteration of the law had upon their claims. They expected these claims to be paid. I do not think the bill ought to be amended as to the interest.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill providing for the payment of judgments rendered under section 11 of chapter 459 of the laws of the first session of the Forty-third Congress."

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CRAGIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 401) to incorporate The Citizens' Building Company of Washington; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 403) to re-imburse the State of West Virginia for the destruction of public property by the Union forces during the war; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAYTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 404) extending the jurisdiction of the district court for the western district of Arkansas; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALLACE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 405) for the relief of William S. Morris, William S. Mann, Charles A. Oakman, George W. Hillman, the Union Transfer Company, and John R. Graham; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSTON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 406) for the relief of Harden W. Reynolds; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPENCER (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 407) to authorize the restoration of George A. Armes to the rank of captain; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 408) for the relief of Assistant Surgeon Thomas F. Azpell, United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and, together with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 409) to equalize promotions in the Army; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 410) for the relief of First Lieutenant George W. Wright, Seventh United States Infantry; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. OGLESBY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 411) for the relief of J. W. Parish & Company, of Illinois; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 412) to extend the time for presenting claims to the Court of Claims and to the southern claims commission; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAPERTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 8) restoring Albert W. Preston to his rank of colonel on the retired list of the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Harvey Lull be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. INGALLS, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of John Z. Friend be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. McDONALD, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Joseph Duncan be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I give notice that to-morrow at one o'clock I will ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the centennial bill, so called, making an appropriation of $1,500,000 for the centennial exposition. I hope that whatever they propose to do on that subject the Senate will do to-morrow.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 11) authorizing G. Harris Heap, United States consul at Tunis, to accept the trust of commissioner of the Bey of Tunis.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 62) to authorize George P. Marsh to accept a certain present from the government of Switzerland and a certain present from the government of Italy.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (S. No. 53) fixing the time of holding the circuit court of the United States in the districts of California, Oregon, and Nevada, with an amendment; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 556) granting a pension to Alexander St. Bernard, of Saint Clair County, Michigan;

A bill (H. R. No. 231) for the relief of Robert Erwin;

A bill (H. R. No. 247) for the relief of James M. Coffinberry, of Cleveland Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 1347) granting a pension to Hattie D. McKain;

A bill (H. R. No. 31) granting a pension to Patrick Glackin;

A bill (H. R. No. 1803) to provide for the appointment of commissioners to take affidavits, &c., for the courts of the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 1802) making an appropriation to pay fourteen crippled and disabled Union soldiers from the 6th day of December, 1875, to the 30th day of June, 1876; and

A bill (H. R. No. 934) regulating the practice of United States circuit and district courts as to the time and manner of instructing juries and arguing the cause.

PUBLIC LANDS IN SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 2) to repeal section 2303 of the Revised Statutes of the United States making restrictions in the disposition of the public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The unfinished business will be up in two minutes. It is scarcely worth while to take up that bill now.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am inclined to think that I can get the consent of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] to allow this bill to proceed after the morning hour. If I do not get it, of course that will end it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We cannot do anything with the bill in two minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 2) to repeal section 2303 of the Revised Statutes of the United States making restrictions in the disposition of the public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. SARGENT to the amendment of Mr. THURMAN.

Mr. THURMAN'S amendment was to insert at the end of the section the following proviso:

Provided, That the repeal of said section shall not have the effect to impair the right, complete or inchoate, of any homestead settler; and no land occupied by such settler at the time this act shall take effect shall be subject to entry, pre-emption, or sale.

Mr. SARGENT'S amendment was to add to the amendment of Mr. THURMAN the following:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed in any manner to revive the law commonly called the graduation act.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have no objection to either one of those amendments, but I suggest that the amendment to the amendment be withdrawn for the simple reason that the graduation law was repealed in 1862 and is not in force at all. If the Senator from California were here, I think he would withdraw that amendment. He became satisfied the other day that the act was not in force, and that the amendment was unnecessary. So far as the amendment of the Senator from Ohio is concerned, I take it that it is entirely useless because if we pass this bill it cannot interfere with any rights any person may have under the homestead law. It leaves the homestead law in force and cannot possibly interfere with it; but I shall not object to its being placed in the bill if Senators think it necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment, proposed by the Senator from California.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move the following amendment, to come in at the end of the bill as a distinct clause:

And provided, That the public lands affected by this act shall not be open to private entry until the same shall be offered at public sale after the passage of this act.

Mr. CLAYTON. I hope this amendment will not be adopted for the simple reason that it will destroy almost the entire effect of this bill. The lands that this bill refers to have been offered lands. As I before stated, they have been in the market for upwards of fifty years; they have been offered at a dollar and a quarter an acre; they have been offered at twelve and a half cents an acre, nearly all of them; they are lands which are unfit for agriculture, as I before stated; and the object of this bill—I do not disguise it and have not—is that these offered lands which have failed to receive a purchaser for the last fifty years, which could not receive a purchaser at twelve and a half cents an acre, shall now be put in the market. All lands that have not been offered, of course will not be in the market. The provisions of the homestead law will apply to all these lands.

To illustrate the matter, suppose a homestead settler has located a farm of one hundred and sixty acres, say in a valley surrounded on every side by hills. He has picked out a little spot in that valley that is capable of agriculture. Now, suppose he wants to add eighty acres or one hundred and sixty acres to his little farm of timbered land which is unfit for agriculture. If this bill passes, he can go to the land-office and locate that land by paying a dollar and a quarter an acre for it, the same as a man under similar circumstances can in Missouri now and can in other States not affected by these restrictions. I think it is right that he should be allowed to do so. If a citizen in one of these States wants to establish a saw-mill upon Government land and desires to purchase it for that purpose, with this bill enacted into a law he can go to the land-office, and, if the lands have been offered for sale before, as most of them have, he can purchase a tract and establish a saw-mill upon it. The object of this bill is that those lands which are unfit for agriculture shall come into the market.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The ground upon which this bill was supported the other day chiefly was, that here was a variety of timbered land, the timber upon which was valuable, valuable enough to lead enterprising citizens to engage in the business of lumbering, to work the timber into lumber and then to sell it; and that this bill ought to pass so that they could do it.

The timber on those lands is at present the property of the United States, and I think the Treasury needs all the money that can be honestly got for them, and that the enterprising citizen who wishes to go into the lumber business on these lands ought to have the chance in preference to the other if he will give more than the other citizen will for a given section or quarter section, or whatever the subdivision is. It must be, if this timber is worth enough to encourage enterprise to go into the lumber business there, that it is worth more than a dollar and a quarter an acre. It is true, as the Senator has said, that the largest proportion of these lands probably, certainly great quantities of them, have already been offered at public sale, so that if we pass the bill as it is there will be no opportunity for competition at all by purchasers; and anybody who is quick enough and can form his combinations, or without any combinations, can go in and take up the lands at the minimum price of a dollar and a quarter an acre and exclude somebody who would be very glad to give $10 an acre for some of the sections at any rate, or even twenty or thirty dollars, depending on location, nearness to water-courses, the character and amount of the timber, and all those things which I need not name which enter into the question of the value of timber lands.

Now, my proposition is not to allow these lands to go at private entry until in the altered condition of the country, with free labor everywhere and increasing populations in those States, all the incentives to the increase of wealth growing out of the increase of the value of these lands should be weighed; and therefore that they shall again be offered at public sale, those that have not been, so that open bidders may compete with each other to buy these lands at the price that the person who is willing to give the most for them shall pay. I am surprised that the Senator from Arkansas objects to that. If I did not know him so well and those whose interests he is supporting so well, I should rather suppose that away back behind this bill somewhere was a scheme to get possession of these valuable lands, or those of them that are valuable, at a mere nominal price. I know that the Senator does not mean that; of course I have no idea that any person with whom he is in communication does mean it; but I know that it is our duty to protect the Treasury and get for these lands the largest price that we can get, and instead of saying that we will sell them at a horizontal price of a dollar and a quarter an acre we will now sell them, under the altered condition of the country, to the party that will give the most for them.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont seems to think that if he did not know me so well as he does he would suspect that there might be away back of this somewhere a scheme. Well, with the shrewdness of that Senator, I should suppose he would be able to discover that scheme. I know it is a very common thing nowadays when gentlemen hailing from the portion of the country I come from and from some portions of the West bring measures here, for certain other gentlemen who possess all the virtue and honesty of the country to suspect when they cannot discover schemes in what they bring here. I am not surprised at all that some one has supposed that there might be away back here somewhere a scheme. Now, I think the best thing for them to do is to discover that scheme and point it out to the Senate before they make such suppositions. There is no scheme in this bill except to put these five States upon an equality with other States of this Union. If that is a scheme, then there is a scheme in it—to put the citizens of these five States upon an equality with the citizens of other States of this Union, nothing more.

So far as the Senator's amendment is concerned, it would apply with equal force to all the other States of this Union in which public lands are located that are now subject to private entry. Why not re-offer them for sale again, lands that are manifestly fertile and valuable, instead of picking out these barren lands to put through a long process of being offered in the market again? The objection I have to the amendment is that it will consume a great deal of time. It will consume money. It will require a large outlay of money to put these lands into the market again and go through the process of offering them for sale. My word for it, you will find if you undertake this thing that the Government will be out of money instead of the maker by it.

The condition of those lands is well known by Senators here. Men who have been in these States, who know the condition of these lands, have attested over and over again their condition. Gentlemen who are unfamiliar with them insist that they are of a different character from what the gentlemen who are familiar with them say they are. It is a well known fact that the Land Department has reported to the Senate that these lands are barren and unfit for agriculture. The Land Department has recommended this legislation. Every person who is familiar with the lands recommends it. Every Senator upon the floor from those States recommends it—every one, so far as I know. Last Friday this question was put aside for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BRUCE] to speak upon the subject. If I am correctly informed—and the Senator from Mississippi will correct me if I am not—he has carefully gone over this subject, and he is satisfied that the bill ought to pass. The idea was given out here at first that it might interfere with the rights of the colored man. That was the first objection brought forward in order to defeat this bill. Now we find that the gentleman who represents that particular constituency, after having had his attention called to it, after having carefully examined it, has withdrawn any objection he may have had, and he declares himself ready to vote for the bill. But now at the eleventh hour this question presented by the amendment of the Senator from Vermont is raised, which only can defeat it for a certain length of time by putting off the thing for two or three years longer. That is all it will amount to. You will go through the circumlocution of having plats of these lands sent out to the local land offices, having them advertised, having them put in the market by the auctioneer, and you will find that nobody will pay more than a dollar and a quarter an acre for them; and after all that is gone through with, then you will allow your citizen who is waiting all this time to come in and obtain the same rights which are accorded to other citizens of the United States.

I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is called for; the morning hour has expired.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move to suspend temporarily the regular order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You cannot make a motion of that kind.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senator from Arkansas how long he thinks this matter will take? Will it take more than a few minutes?

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not think it will. I have said about all I care to say.

Mr. MORTON. Let it go on informally a little while, but not long, subject to a call for the regular order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think we are all interested, as the Senator from Indiana said the other day, in disposing of this question of the highest privilege, which has been, as he stated, postponed too long. It will take just so much time to dispose of this question of privilege and it will be delayed by just the amount of time that this bill will occupy. There are a good many things to be said yet about this bill by some gentlemen who have not spoken at all, and there are other amendments to be offered. Therefore I think we ought to proceed to act on the unfinished business and determine it once for all in some way before we take up anything else.

Mr. CLAYTON. I hope not. I hope this bill will be continued. The Senator from Indiana makes no objection, I understand, and I hope we shall be allowed to go on with it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It happens that there are two sides to the question that the Senator from Indiana has in charge. One side of it is an amendment offered by myself. If the Senator from Indiana were not ready with the Pinchback question, of course that would be one thing; but we know he is, and he has stated it to be important. Therefore I repeat what I said before, that I think we ought to dispose of the Pinchback question before we take up anything else, and have it determined one way or the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business being before the Senate, the Senator from Arkansas moves that it be postponed for the purpose of continuing the bill which has been under discussion during the morning.

The question being put, a division was called for.

Mr. CLAYTON. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is before the Senate.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. U. S. GRANT, jr., his Secretary, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the act (S. No 204) to remove the political disabilities of George S. Hawkins, of Florida.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, offered by Mr. MORTON on the 5th of March, 1875:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback be admitted as a Senator from the State of Louisiana for the term of six years beginning the 4th day of March, 1873.

The pending question being on the amendment of Mr. EDMUNDS to insert the word "not" before the word "admitted."

Mr. MORTON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I know that it will be irksome to the Senate to listen to further discussion of the question before it; and, certainly, no task could be more disagreeable to me than that of repeating what I have more than once said upon it. But the chairman of the committee [Mr. MORTON] who reported the resolution under consideration, for the admission of Pinchback to a seat in this body—although at previous sessions he had frequently and fully discussed the subject—deemed it important, last Friday, to recall to the memories of Senators the grounds upon which he advocates the resolution; and if it was proper for him to do that, as no one I suppose will deny, it is equally proper, Senators, to refresh your memories by a reference to the arguments upon the other side. This I shall attempt to do, not by a full, much less an exhaustive, argument, but by a brief and condensed summary of the case. And I shall stick to the case. I shall not suffer any provocation to make me wander from it for a moment. I shall not, therefore, reply to the party appeals of the Senator from Indiana. I shall make no such appeals myself. And, certainly, I shall not leave the State of Louisiana to discuss the elections of the State of Georgia and attempt to season my remarks by a rehearsal of the reported sayings, whether well or ill-founded, of Mr. Robert Toombs. I am not accustomed to argue a legal question in that mode. I am not accustomed to make the right of any man depend upon the utterances of some other man, a stranger to the record and the case. The question before us is, in its nature, judicial, and should be judicially considered. It is a simple question of legal right; as much so as a question of legal right to land in an action of ejectment. There is no room for party or political considerations in its decision. If Pinchback has a legal right to the seat he claims, he ought to be seated, whatever may be the party or political effect of seating him. If, on the other hand, he has no such legal right, no party or political considerations can justify us in seating him. In other words, he is neither to gain or to lose a seat in the Senate by considerations that have no relevancy to the legality of his claim. If we allow such motives to influence our votes, we usurp the powers of a State Legislature and elect a Senator, instead of exercising our constitutional, judicial function of determining who has been elected, or whether there has been an election at all.

The first point made by the Senator from Indiana is, that Pinchback has a prima facie case because he holds a certificate of election signed by William Pitt Kellogg as governor of Louisiana, and that, therefore, he should be seated at once; and if any valid objection to his election exists, that is to be subsequently inquired into. If this proposition be true, the Senate has done the grossest injustice to Pinchback and a flagrant wrong to the State he claims to represent. Ever since the resignation of her Senator, Kellogg, a period of more than three years, Louisiana has had but one Senator on this floor. Claimants enough, and more than enough, for the vacant seat have appeared. Not to speak of others, let me remind you that in January, 1873, came John Ray, with the certificate of William Pitt Kellogg as governor that he had been duly elected to fill Kellogg's unexpired term. And afterward came P. B. S. Pinchback, with a similar certificate that he had been duly elected for the full term of six years; and that both Ray and Pinchback were elected by the same body of men claiming to be the Legislature of their State. If, then, Pinchback has a prima facie case, so had Ray; and if Pinchback has a prima facie case now, he has had precisely the same case ever since March 4, 1873. Why, then, was not Ray seated on his prima facie case; and why have nearly three years been suffered to elapse without seating Pinchback on his prima facie case? And why, at our very last session—after a period of two years of such flagrant wrong and injustice, if the proposition of the Senator from Indiana is sound—was the decision of Pinchback's claim postponed for nine months more, on the motion of one of his supporters, the Senator from his State? And why did the Senator from Indiana vote for the postponement? Have Senators been so obtuse that for three years they have been unable to comprehend a plain, valid, prima facie case, even when fully and often explained by the able Senator from Indiana? Is that the caliber of the forty-odd lawyers who hold or have held seats in the Senate since this question arose? Why, Mr President, if such be the case, the sooner these lawyers resign their seats and go to some good law-school the better it will be for them and for the country. And mark it, Senators, the failure to seat Ray and Pinchback cannot be attributed to the opposition of a hostile party majority, for they have all the time belonged and yet belong to the dominant party on this floor. Why, then, I repeat, was Ray kept out, notwithstanding his prima facie case? And why has Pinchback been suffered to wander through these Halls and corridors for three long years, like a rejected ghost on the banks of the Styx, and found no majority to do him justice? There is but one answer to give to this question, but one answer that is consistent with the character, the dignity, and the sense of justice of the Senate; and that is, that Senators, without respect to party affiliations, have not been able to see that he has either a prima facie or an actual right to the seat he claims. And should he be seated now by the votes of Senators whose votes have heretofore kept him out, the strangest spectacle will have been presented, of a change of legal opinions with changing circumstances, of a decision affected by matters subsequent and alien to the controversy, that has ever yet been seen in the history of the Senate. Nine months ago the friends of Pinchback were unwilling that the decisive vote should be taken. Why unwilling? But one answer can be given: they knew, or at least they thought, that he would be rejected. Had he been rejected then, no one can tell whether a republican or a democrat would have been elected in his stead. But now that the result of the so-called Wheeler compromise has been to give the democratic party a majority on joint ballot in the Legislature of Louisiana, who have proceeded to elect J. B. Eustis, the Senator from Indiana hastens to warn his party friends that they have to choose between Pinchback, the republican, and Eustis, the democrat; as if you, republican Senators, who only nine months ago were conscientiously opposed to Pinchback's claim, are now bound to suppress your convictions, smother your consciences, and humbly vote to admit him in order to prevent the admission of a democrat. Alas, Mr. President, we have fallen to a low estate indeed, if a claim to a seat in this body, sometimes called august, is to be decided by such a consideration!

Mr. HOWE. Will it interrupt the Senator if I ask him one question?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir, it will. As I am making an argument, I prefer not to be interrupted. I will with pleasure answer any question the Senator asks when I am done.

Mr. HOWE. Certainly I will not ask a question if it will interrupt the Senator.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, in view of the facts to which I have referred, I maintain that whether Pinchback has a prima facie case or not is no longer an open question. It has been decided by the refusal of the Senate for nearly three years to seat him and by its refusal to seat his predecessor, Ray. To say now, after these refusals, that he has a prima facie case is in effect to attribute to the Senate the grossest stupidity or the grossest injustice; and neither imputation is admissible. No, sir; the Senate knew what it was about when it refused, or neglected, which is equivalent to a refusal, to seat Ray or to seat Pinchback upon a supposed prima facie case. It knew that the Senate, by its proper committee, had investigated the merits of the case, and that all the facts of the case had been reported by that committee and were before the Senate. And it knew that when a court has gone into the merits of a case there is no longer room to talk of prima facies. A prima facie case is good only when the actual case is not before the court. The moment the actual case appears the prima facie case vanishes. Here we have the actual case before us. We ordered our committee to ascertain it; it did ascertain it and reported it to us; the report stands uncontradicted by further testimony; the facts have become a part of the authentic and official history of the country, and we are as much bound to take notice of them as we are bound to take notice of any fact in the history of the Republic. In view of these facts thus brought before us, and which we are thus bound to recognize, there is no longer a prima facie case upon which we have to decide. Our decision must be upon the merits, for it would be the height of absurdity to admit Pinchback upon a prima facie case, and then upon the testimony already before us turn around and the next day unseat him.

Before leaving this point I ought perhaps to notice the fact that, at a previous session, the Senator from Indiana quoted some remarks of mine in the Goldthwaite case to support his proposition that the certificate of the governor constitutes a prima facie case. But every lawyer knows that the language of a court is to be restricted to the case in hand, and the same rule applies to the language of a Senator in reference to a judicial question. Thus restricted, my remarks, quoted by the Senator, were, so far as my investigations had gone and as I believed, perfectly correct; although I have since been informed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] that a more thorough search into the precedents discloses the fact that I had overlooked some of them and that my statement was too broad; and I think that, at the last session, he referred to some cases in which it was held that the governor's commission did not constitute a prima facie case. But I repeat that what I said in the Goldthwaite case was correct when applied to the facts of that case; but they have no application to a case like the present. The body that elected Goldthwaite was confessedly the Legislature of Alabama, the governor who commissioned him was confessedly the governor of the State, and no investigation by the Senate, or any committee thereof, had taken place; and so there was not one particle of testimony before the Senate to invalidate his election. And the memorial presented against him did not question the existence of a lawful Legislature or the title of the governor. It simply questioned the right of certain members of the Legislature to their seats—a question of which we could have no cognizance, and even had their seats been vacated there would have remained far more than a quorum of lawfully-elected members, and consequently a lawful Legislature. Of course, in a case like that, I was correct in saying that the governor's certificate made a prima facie case. But what has that to do with the case in hand, in which there were two bodies, each claiming to be the Legislature of Louisiana, and two persons each claiming to be the governor of the State, and our committee had reported that neither body was a lawful Legislature and that neither person ought to be recognized as governor? To apply my remarks to a case like this is simply to ignore the broadest and most fundamental distinctions between the cases, and to wholly misapply them. Besides, on a subsequent day, I stated the rule with greater fullness and accuracy, as follows; I read the remarks I made on that subsequent occasion:

Mr. THURMAN. The Committee on Privileges and Elections, in accordance with the universal practice of this body from the foundation of the Government to this day, a practice that has not a single exception, reported that the credentials of this gentleman being correct, and he having been elected by a body competent to elect, he was prima facie entitled to his seat and to be sworn in, and that any ground of contest would be heard afterward.—Congressional Globe, second session, Forty-second Congress, part 1, page 320.

Here you see, Mr. President, that the rule, as I stated it, requires that the claimant shall have "been elected by a body competent to elect;" but the very fact upon which Pinchback's case turns is, "Was he elected by such a body?" If he was, no one denies his right to a seat; if he was not, a thousand governor's commissions could not confer that right. And this brings me to the merits of the case. In considering them I find it unnecessary to inquire who was the lawful, or the de facto governor of Louisiana, McEnery or Kellogg. For, as I have said, if Pinchback was elected by a lawful Legislature, he is entitled to be seated, he could not be deprived of his seat by a refusal of either Kellogg or McEnery to give the proper certificate. On the other hand, if the body of men who elected him was not the Legislature, then he would have no title even had McEnery and Kellogg both certified that he was elected. Now what are the facts? I shall state them as found by your committee, for to give them in detail, from the thousand pages of testimony, would occupy too much time and be too great a draught upon your patience. For you have heard that testimony discussed time and again, and its general features are all that need be recalled to your memories.

On November 4, 1872, a general election was held in Louisiana for a governor and other State officers, members of Congress, one-half of the State senate, and all the members of the house of representatives of the State. There were two parties who had tickets in the field, the republican party, whose candidate for governor was William Pitt Kellogg, and the fusion party, so called, whose gubernatorial candidate was John McEnery. And each of these parties had its candidates for the other State offices and for members of the General Assembly. The official returns of the election showed majorities ranging from nine to fifteen thousand for the fusion candidates on the State ticket and the election of a large majority of fusion candidates to the Legislature. Upon these returns the senate, including the senators who held over, stood 22 fusionists and 11 republicans and the house stood 71 fusionists and 39 republicans. These facts were abundantly proved before your Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I am not aware that they are disputed by any one. (See report of committee, Carpenter's, page 81, et seq.) And yet the body of men assuming to be the legislature of the State, who pretended to elect Pinchback United States Senator, contained a majority of republicans. How was this strange result brought about? You have only to look at the report of your committee and the accompanying testimony to see. The whole history is there given in great fullness and detail. I have no time to repeat it, and therefore let it suffice for me to say that, under a law of Louisiana, which your committee found to be unconstitutional, all election returns were to be canvassed by five men, called a returning board; that three men, to wit, John Lynch, James Longstreet, and George E. Bovee, unlawfully assuming and usurping the functions of this board, pretended to canvass the election without a single official return before them, and, by rejecting about thirty-one fusionists, who, according to the official returns, were elected, and substituting for them thirty-one defeated republicans, constituted a sham legislature containing a republican majority; that, to carry this conspiracy into effect, E. H. Durell, district judge of the United States, "out of court, late at night, December 5, and without application by any party," made an order that the marshal of the United States should "forthwith take possession of the building known as the Mechanics' Institute, and occupied as the State House for the assembling of the Legislature therein, in the city of New Orleans, and hold the same subject to the further order of this court, and meanwhile to prevent all unlawful assemblage therein under the guise or pretext of authority claimed by virtue of pretended canvass and returns of said returning officers," (that is to say, the De Feriet board, who had canvassed the actual official returns and whose canvass had been proclaimed by the governor pursuant to law;) that, in compliance with this order of the judge, the marshal, S. B. Packard, taking to his aid a body of Federal troops, seized the State House the same night and held armed possession thereof with said troops for about six weeks; that, two days after the making of said order, to wit, on December 7, the same judge, in a suit brought by C. C. Antoine, enjoined every senator and member elected to the Legislature who had not been returned by the so-called Lynch board from participating in any manner in the organization of the assembly; that this order was enforced by Marshal Packard, aided by his Federal troops, by excluding all such members from the State House at the time fixed for the assembling of the Legislature, to wit, December 9; that consequently no one who was not returned by said Lynch board was permitted to take part in such organization, and the republican portion of those thus returned, containing less than a quorum of the lawfully-elected members, assumed to be the legislature of the State and made a pretended organization as such; and that this was the body of men—thirty-one of whom had no color of title to seats in the assembly—thus constituted by the void orders of a Federal judge and sustained in their usurpation by the bayonets of the Federal Army, who, on the following 15th of January, and while the State House was still in possession of Marshal Packard and the military, assumed to elect P. B. S. Pinchback a Senator of the United States.

And now, Mr. President, what said your committee in reference to these proceedings?

First, in respect to the Lynch board, which is made the foundation for this so-called legislature, the committee said:

The following are some of the objections to the validity of their proceedings:
1. The board had been abolished by the act of November 20.

So that even if the board had ever had a legal existence, its legal existence was gone by that act.

2. The board was under valid and existing injunctions restraining it from acting at all, and an injunction in the Armstead case restraining it from making any canvass not based upon the official returns of the election.
3. Conceding the board was in existence, and had full authority to canvass the returns, it had no returns to canvass.
The returns from the parishes had been made, under the law of 1870, to the governor, and not one of them was before the Lynch board.
It was testified before your committee by Mr. Bovee himself—

He was one of this Lynch board—who participated in this canvass by the Lynch board, that they were determined to have a republican legislature, and made their canvass to that end. The testimony abundantly establishes the fraudulent character of their canvass. In some cases they had what were supposed to be copies of the original returns, in other cases they had nothing but newspaper statements, and in other cases, where they had nothing whatever to act upon, they made an estimate based upon their knowledge of the political complexion of the parish, of what the vote ought to have been. They also counted a large number of affidavits purporting to be sworn to by voters who had been wrongfully denied registration or the right to vote, many of which affidavits they must have known to be forgeries. It was testified by one witness that he forged over a thousand affidavits, and delivered them to the Lynch board while it was in session. It is quite unnecessary to waste time in considering this part of the case; for no person can examine the testimony ever so cursorily without seeing that this pretended canvass had no semblance of integrity.

Yet upon that pretended canvass, made by three men without a shadow of right to act as a returning board, having not a single official return before them, and who, according to the oath of Bovee, canvassed with a determination to make a republican legislature, this Federal judge made his order, and Federal troops were employed to keep out of that State-house and out of that assembly every man that this fraudulent and pretended board did not return.

Well, sir, let us go on further. Secondly, what said your committee in respect to Durell's midnight order—that order for the seizure of the State-house and the exclusion from it of the members who were certified to be elected by the De Feriet board, the only board your committee say that had the semblance or color of legal right, and a board which I say, after carefully looking into this report, was the lawful returning board; and what Senator Trumbull said in favor of its legality is fully sustained by the facts—what did your committee say in reference to this midnight order of Durell to exclude the lawful members from the Legislature, and put that State-house under the control of Federal bayonets? Your committee said:

It is impossible to conceive of a more irregular, illegal, and in every way inexcusable act on the part of a judge. Conceding the power of the court to make such an order—

That was only a concession for the purpose of the argument, not in fact—

Conceding the power of the court to make such an order, the judge, out of court had no more authority to make it than had the marshal. It has not even the form of judicial process. It was not sealed, nor was it signed by the clerk, and had no more legal effect than an order issued by any private citizen.

There had been no amendment of the bill of complaint. The law of November 20 had been promulgated. The De Feriet board had been appointed in pretended pursuance thereof. Whether, under the constitution, the governor had the power, in the vacation of the Legislature, to appoint that board, upon the ground that the act of November 20 created offices, and therefore vacancies in office, your committee do not inquire. But it is understood that the constitution has been so construed in that State, and that Judge Dibble was appointed by the governor under similar circumstances.

The De Feriet board, therefore, had color of official existence. Their canvass was completed, and the result promulgated under color of the State law, and it is clear that this gave the Federal court no more right to seize the State-house than to seize this Capitol.

The marshal, on receiving this pretended order, called for a detachment of United States troops to act as a posse comitatus, seized the State-house at two a. m. of December 6, and held it for weeks.

That is what your committee said in respect to that order of Durell. Again, speaking of it in a subsequent part of the report, they say:

In the opinion of your committee there can be no doubt—conceding the validity of the act of November 20—that it transferred the duty of canvassing the returns of the last election to the board to be elected under the provisions of the act. The act provided for such election by the senate, and, taking effect in the vacation of the Legislature, created offices to be filled thereafter by the senate. This is what is styled in that State an original vacancy, which, happening in the vacation of the Legislature, the governor is authorized to fill by appointment; and it is said that the courts of that State have repeatedly recognized the right of the governor to make such appointments.

That showed that the De Feriet board was a lawful board. And, speaking of Durell's orders, the committee say:

Viewed in any light in which your committee can consider them, the orders and injunctions made and granted by Judge Durell in this cause are most reprehensible, erroneous in point of law, and are wholly void for want of jurisdiction; and your committee must express their sorrow and humiliation that a judge of the United States should have proceeded in such flagrant disregard of his duty and have so far overstepped the limits of Federal jurisdiction.

Thirdly. What said the committee in respect to the last order of Durell, to which I have referred; that order by which he enjoined every senator and member of the house of representatives of the Legislature, who was not on the return of the Lynch board, from taking any part whatsoever in the organization of the Assembly, in consequence of which they were wholly excluded from that State-house and the conspirators were enabled to proceed with their so-called organization? I read again from the report, pages 43 and 44. After showing that the judge could by no possibility have had any jurisdiction to make that order; that it was made directly in the face of the act of Congress which provides that the jurisdiction of the judge shall not extend to the election of members of a State Legislature; after showing that this order which undertook to determine who were the members-elect of that Legislature was not only a flagrant usurpation of the judge, but was directly in the very teeth of the act of Congress under which he pretended to act, the committee conclude as follows:

Indeed, it is impossible not to see that this bill was filed, and the restraining order thereon was issued, for the sole purpose of accomplishing what no Federal court has the jurisdiction to do, the organization of a State Legislature.

And your committee cannot refrain from expressing their astonishment that any judge of the United States should thus unwarrantably have interfered with a State government, and know no language too strong to express their condemnation of such a proceeding.

It is the opinion of your committee that, but for the unjustifiable interference of Judge Durell, whose orders were executed by United States troops, the canvass made by the De Feriet board and promulgated by the governor, declaring McEnery to have been elected governor, &c., and also declaring who had been elected to the Legislature, would have been acquiesced in by the people and that government would have entered quietly upon the exercise of the sovereign power of the State. But the proceedings of Judge Durell and the support given to him by United States troops resulted in establishing the authority de facto of Kellogg and his associates in State offices and of the persons declared by the Lynch board to be elected to the Legislature. We have already seen that the proceedings of that board cannot be sustained without disregarding all the principles of law applicable to the subject and ignoring the distinction between good faith and fraud.

What said the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Indiana? [Mr. MORTON.] I read from his minority report, page 76:

The conduct of Judge Durell, sitting in the circuit court of the United States, cannot be justified or defended. He grossly exceeded his jurisdiction and assumed the exercise of powers to which he could lay no claim. The only authority he had in the matter grew out of the act of Congress of 1870 to enforce the fifteenth amendment, and the act amendatory of that, passed in 1871, which gave to the courts of the United States jurisdiction in all cases in law and equity arising under the former act. Under the first act two classes of cases might arise: first, actions to enforce the rights of those who had been illegally denied the right to vote upon the ground of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and, second, actions to enforce the rights of those who had been deprived of office by reason of the denial to persons of the right to vote on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and suits in equity, ancillary or in aid of these rights of action, would come within the jurisdiction of the circuit court of the United States, among which would be a suit to perpetuate testimony. But the pretense that in a suit to perpetuate testimony the court could go beyond the natural and reasonable jurisdiction, to decide who constituted the legal returning board under the laws of Louisiana, and to enforce the rights of such as it might determine to be members of that board and to enjoin others who were not, is without any foundation in law or logic.

In the Antoine case, Judge Durell not only assumed to determine who constituted the legal returning board, but to prescribe who should be permitted to take part in the organization of the Legislature and to enjoin all persons from taking part in such organization who were not returned by the Lynch board as elected; and this assumption of jurisdiction was made in the face of the express provision in the act of 1870 that its benefits should not extend to candidates for electors, for Congress, or for the State Legislature. His order issued in the Kellogg case to the United States marshal to take possession of the State-house for the purpose of preventing unlawful assemblages, under which the marshal called to his aid a portion of the Army of the United States as a posse comitatus, can only be characterized as a gross unsurpation.

Those were the opinions of the Senator from Indiana when that report was made, and there never were truer words spoken by man; and they are conclusive of this case, unless, indeed, the Senate is prepared to say that a so-called legislature, established by the void orders of a judge and the unlawful use of the military power, a sham legislature, in which there never was a day, up to the time and for some time after the election of Pinchback, when there was a quorum in it of the lawfully-elected members of that body, is to be recognized; unless the Senate is prepared to sanctify the most flagrant usurpation known in the history of a State, and give one of the chief conspirators the reward for his crime.

But further, sir, what were the conclusions of the committee after reviewing the whole case? They are found on pages 44 and 50. On page 44 the committee say:

Your committee are therefore led to the conclusion that, if the election held in November, 1872, be not absolutely void for frauds committed therein, McEnery and his associates in State offices, and the persons certified as members of the Legislature by the De Feriet board, ought to be recognized as the legal government of the State. Considering all the facts established before your committee, there seems no escape from the alternative that the McEnery government must be recognized by Congress, or Congress must provide for a re-election.

Let us pause for one moment to consider the full scope of this statement. They report that if there is any legal government at all, it is the McEnery government; if there is any legal governor at all, McEnery is the man; if there is any legal Legislature, it is the McEnery legislature; and they declare, in the most positive and decisive terms, that this so-called Pinchback legislature was no Legislature at all. They afterward go further. Having demolished Pinchback and his legislature and Kellogg and his governorship, they proceed to demolish, upon rumor and suspicion and the like—no, some testimony, too, for I want to be perfectly fair—McEnery and his legislature, as they suppose. Then what conclusion does that bring them to? First, having found upon irrefragable testimony that the so-called Pinchback legislature had no legal validity at all, and then after having found upon what they admit to be very loose kind of testimony that the McEnery government also had no legal existence, they come to this conclusion at the close of their report, which they embrace in two resolutions:

Therefore your committee recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That there is no State government at present existing in the State of Louisiana.

If there was no State government existing at all, then the so-called legislature which elected Pinchback had no legal validity. They report that there was no legal government then in Louisiana; and that disposes of the so-called legislature which elected Pinchback and the McEnery legislature that elected McMillen. Then they report a second resolution:

2. Resolved, That neither John Ray nor W. L. McMillen is entitled to a seat in the Senate, neither having been elected by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana.

Ah! neither John Ray nor McMillen whose credentials were before them had been elected by the Legislature of Louisiana. But it was precisely that so-called legislature which elected Ray that elected Pinchback, and, if I recollect aright, on the very self-same day; and it was precisely that so-called McEnery legislature that elected McMillen and that at the same time, so that they report in their resolution that this body called a legislature, by which Ray and Pinchback were elected, was not a Legislature of the State of Louisiana.

Now, who signed that report? It was signed by Matt. H. Carpenter, JOHN A. LOGAN, J. L. ALCORN, and H. B. ANTHONY. Mr. Trumbull made a separate report for himself concurring in the condemnation of the Pinchback legislature and holding it to be no Legislature at all, but disagreeing in respect to whether McEnery had been elected governor, and also disagreeing in reference to a remedy that had been proposed. He, therefore, is to be added to those who condemned this sham legislature by which Pinchback was elected.

Who next? Next comes the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. Hill.] He also condemned the Pinchback legislature, held that it had no legal existence, and he only dissented from the majority of the committee as to the mode of redress. So here are six members of this committee concurring in every word that I have said to-day.

Then comes the seventh, the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Indiana, and does he dispute any one of these facts that I have related to-day? I think not. If he does, I have overlooked it. But he bases his dissent from the views of the committee, if I understand his report and have not overlooked anything in it, solely, or, if not solely, mainly, upon certain decisions of the supreme court of Louisiana, which he says recognized the Lynch board and the Pinchback legislature; and, becoming an advocate of State-rights all at once, he maintains that we are bound by these decisions of the supreme court of Louisiana.

Now, Mr. President, I have this single remark to make to my friends who signed this report: If they will stand to-day by their solemnly recorded convictions; if they will give the vote this day which their report requires them to give, by a logic which is perfectly inexorable; if they will say to-day, as they said when they made this careful report to us, that the body that elected Ray, being the same body that elected Pinchback, was not the Legislature of the State of Louisiana—if they will say that, I think there will be an end of the question.

That is not all, Mr. President. Mr. Carpenter afterward introduced a bill in consonance with these resolutions, providing for a new election in the State of Louisiana, and that bill was founded entirely upon this report. The only basis for the bill was that there was no lawful government within the State of Louisiana. The only basis for the bill was what is declared in this first resolution:

That there is no State government at present existing in the State of Louisiana.

That bill after a long debate came to a vote in this Senate. I had the vote before me a little while ago. Suffice it to say that it received the votes of 18 for and there were 20 against, and of the eighteen who voted for it seventeen were republicans, and eight of those republicans are on this floor to-day; and, if they will stand by the logic which brought them to give their votes then, this question will be decided, and decided according to the very right of the case. They cannot justify, they cannot pretend to justify, themselves for one moment in their vote in favor of that bill, except upon the ground reported by this committee, that there was then no State government in existence in Louisiana. That is the only justification they can have for the vote they gave for that bill, and, therefore, if what they thought then was true, they are bound to give effect to that fact and to say that Pinchback, elected by a body called a legislature but which was no Legislature at all, has no right to a seat on this floor.

And here I wish to say—and I wish to say it with all proper respect to these gentlemen, for I am not assuming to lecture them as to their duty; I am not accustomed to lecture Senators as to their duty—but I beg leave in the most respectful manner to call to their attention the fact that, although subsequent events might make it wise or even justifiable for them to recognize Kellogg as now the governor of the State, that is no justification for their voting to seat Mr. Pinchback. Subsequent events—the acquiescence of the people of Louisiana, the long time he has held the office, the short time that remains of his term—might justify Senators in recognizing him as the governor, at least de facto, out of political considerations; but when it comes to voting upon the question whether Mr. Pinchback is entitled to a seat in this body you cannot get rid of the question, Was the body that elected him the Legislature of that State? And no subsequent events can make it the Legislature if it was not so at the time that election took place. If it was not the Legislature then, there is no process of ratification that, going back to the beginning, makes it a Legislature ab initio. There is no such thing as that known to the law of a case like this. It is therefore perfectly plain that if those Senators who voted for that bill—the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. CRAGIN,] the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] and the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN]—will vote to-day, as they voted on Mr. Carpenter's bill, for a new election in Louisiana, I say once more that this question will be decided, and decided correctly and right.

Now, Mr. President, the whole matter of this case is in a nut-shell. There is one thing upon which the question turns, and that is, Was that body of men who assumed to elect Pinchback the lawful Legislature of the State of Louisiana? If they were, then this fact entitles him to the seat; if they were not, then he is not entitled to the seat, and by no possibility can anything cure the defect in his title.

In respect to the decisions of the supreme court of Louisiana upon which the Senator from Indiana places such great reliance, if there ever was anything demonstrated by legal argument it is demonstrated by the report of the committee that those were decisions made without jurisdiction of the questions they professed to decide; that what the court said in reference to the Lynch board and the Pinchback legislature was mere obiter dictum, and that no respect whatever is due to those decisions under the circumstances of the case. I shall not go into that page of judicial history, the most painful and the most disgraceful page of judicial history ever written in the annals of this Republic; a page of history in which not only error but corruption stares you in the face at every step you take; a page of judicial history which shows men rewarded for the part they took in this conspiracy by being elevated to the bench by Pinchback when acting as governor, and by Kellogg afterward; a page of history which shows the relatives of judges receiving high and lucrative positions, and the decision of the judge in precise accordance with the wishes of those who granted the office. I say I will not go into that in detail. It is a scene too disgusting for any man to wish willingly to look upon. I pass it by, for there is one conclusive answer to all that has been said about the decisions of the supreme court of Louisiana; and that is, that the question before us is to be decided by this Senate and by this Senate alone, and that the decision of no court, not even if it were the Supreme Court of the United States, has even the force of a precedent on a question like this. The Constitution makes the Senate the sole judge of the elections, returns, and qualification of its members. It cannot, therefore, be bound by the decision of any other tribunal or any ohter body of men. If it could be, it would cease to be the sole judge. If it could be, its power would be limited and hampered from day to day, as the courts of the country might render their decisions. No, sir; this power of decision is vested in us, and in us alone. We cannot abdicate that power; we cannot cast aside the duty to exercise it. We are bound to decide for ourselves, irrespective of anybody's decision; whether that so-called Legislature that elected Pinchback was the real Legislature, the lawful General Assembly of the State of Louisiana. In that inquiry no human power can control our own judgment; no human authority is authorized to interfere with the exercise of our own judgment. We must decide it, for the Constitution compels us to do so by making us the sole judge of that question. Therefore, it is all useless to talk about these decisions, even if they were decisions of courts that stood with their ermine unspotted, their learning undoubted, their firmness and courage undaunted; for even then we would have to say, "While we respect your opinion and appreciate your characters, we must decide for ourselves." But when they come from such a court as that which pronounced them, it is useless to talk about their having even the persuasive force that even the opinion of a good man, though unlettered, would have upon a judge in deciding a cause.

Mr. President, in conclusion I have only once more to repeat that there is but one question in this case; and that is, Was the body that elected Pinchback the lawful Legislature of Louisiana? If it was not, no matter subsequent can make it the lawful Legislature. If it was not, no ratification can go back and make it ab initio lawful. So that we are narrowed down to that one single question.

Now, I say once more that if changing circumstances have not changed legal opinions; if the assertion of the Senator from Indiana in his appeal to you, republican Senators, that you are called to vote between a republican and a democrat as if you were sitting here as electors of a Senator instead of judges to decide whether a Senator has been elected—if that consideration is to have no weight, if you will stand by your consciences of three years ago, if you will stand by your consciences which induced you to vote for the Carpenter bill, then I promise you that there will be a result consistent with justice, consistent with truth, consistent with the dignity and character of the Senate, and of good import for all time to come.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, I have no speech to make upon this occasion. When this case was up last March I expressed my views upon it, and I simply refer to that expression of opinion without here repeating a word of it. I do not wish to take back or change one word that I then said on this question. I stand now where I stood then. I have been utterly unable to see that any subsequent events have in any respect altered the standing of the question. I think the question has been fairly stated by the Senator from Ohio who has just taken his seat. It is a question with the Constitution and laws of the land, and politics have nothing to do with the matter. If I were to allow any partisan consideration to have any influence upon my action in deciding a question purely one of the Constitution and the laws, I should feel that I deserved eternal infamy.

I shall therefore, if here at the time the vote is taken, vote against the admission of Mr. Pinchback, not upon any personal consideration whatever, but simply because I feel bound to do so in observance of the Constitution and the law.

That is all I have to say, sir.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I suspect I do myself, and what is of much more gravity, do the claimant, and what is of still more gravity, do the cause of public morals a wrong in attempting to say a word this afternoon upon this subject. I have not referred to the testimony, to the history upon which this debate hinges, for a year past. I have no written speech to make. And yet, with these odds against me, I presume that extreme thing which only the best equipped men in the Senate should ever attempt to do; and that is not merely to follow the able Senator from Ohio in a debate for which he is carefully prepared, but to do a more audacious thing than that, to differ with that Senator.

Only one consideration could nerve me to take upon myself all these risks, and that consideration is this: I have noticed here to-day, as I have noticed here always since this great question arose, an assumption on the part of those who oppose the claim of Pinchback to a seat here that they were representing the side of good morals, fair dealing, honest politics, respect to law, and, of consequence, that those who defend the right of Mr. Pinchback to a seat here are misrepresenting all these concerns of eternal interest. Therefore, unprepared as I am, I want as well as I can and as briefly as possible to point out some considerations to the Senate, even to the Senator from Ohio, which prevent me from feeling that I am misrepresenting any one of these great interests.

I admit, as distinctly as the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Ohio assert, that this is a judicial question. When I assert, and when I vote upon the right of Mr. Pinchback, I vote because of a conviction, mistaken possibly, but honest I know, that there is not a man on this floor who holds his seat upon a higher title than that which underlies the claimant to this vacant seat from Louisiana—not one of you all. I know it is a judicial question. I stand upon the law and the testimony, as I understand it. Let the Senator from Ohio be assured; let all the Senate and all the world be assured, as I know all the angels are assured, that I put no personal conviction of mine under foot to say these words or to give the vote I shall give.

I agree with the Senator from Ohio on another point. He says, if this is a prima facie case that we have here, we have had the same prima facie case for three years; that nothing has happened to change the case. He is entirely right. The question must be adjudicated upon the facts as they existed on the 4th of March, 1873. Upon those facts I propose to pass it myself. He says, however, that there is no mere prima facie case before the Senate; that we cannot at this late day vote upon the idea that we are only settling the question of a prima facie title; that however it might have been in 1873, we must now pass upon the question on its merits.

No, Mr. President, the Senator is wrong there. I admit we ought to have the full merits of this question before us by this late day. I admit, if you please, that it is our fault, the fault of the Senate, that we have not the full merits before us at this late day. Three years would seem to be ample time in which to get all the testimony that we tried to get. It is not the fault of any one man, not the fault of any one committee, not the fault of any one party in the Senate that we have not all these merits before us. The fact is, we have no evidence before us, as we had not on the 4th of March, 1873. If we had but a prima facie case then, I take the words out of the mouth of the Senator from Ohio, and say that we have but a prima facie case before us now. What was a prima facie case then must be a prima facie case now, the facts being unchanged. But why have we not obtained all the facts in the case? Why can we not see clear to the bottom of that strange farce which was played in Louisiana in 1872 under the name of an election? I think the explanation is very simple. You have it here of record, on the last page of the report which I hold in my hand, a perfectly natural explanation. Two questions were referred by the Senate to the Committee on Privileges and Elections in 1872. One was the question whether Mr. John Ray or Mr. McMillen was elected to the Senate for that short term which expired on the 4th of March, 1873. That question was referred in December. I will not take the time to look at the precise date. The other question referred to the same committee was whether there was any lawful government in Louisiana at that time or not. There were two persons directly interested in the decision of the first question; that is, whether Ray or McMillen was Senator. Ray was defending his own case; McMillen was defending his. There was no party before the committee to represent that other question, whether there was a lawful government in Louisiana or not; but if you look all through the volume you will see that the testimony produced before the committee was marshaled there by the one or the other of those two persons. They were pressing for an early decision of the question. It was only the title to a seat up to the 4th of March following which interested either of them. If they could not get a decision before the 4th of March, a decision would do them no good whatever. Therefore, both those men protested against going into the evidence as to what was the character of the election in November preceding. They said, "No, we have not the time to investigate that; we want you to look at the papers, and see who, upon the face of the papers, has a title to take a seat in the Senate;" and they produced such evidence on the one side and the other as they saw fit respectively to produce, and when they had stopped introducing testimony the case closed, and closed with a remark made by the chairman of the committee which I will read in a momemt. The last witness on the stand was John Ray, and he said:

I desire to call the attention of the committee to a statement—

Mr. STEVENSON. What page does the Senator read from?

Mr. HOWE. The last; page 1095.

I desire to call the attention of the committee to a statement, at a suggestion made by one member of the committee yesterday. I examined and found, and if the committee will act as experts they will find, that the commissioners of elections in several cases in the parishes have their names forged to the affidavits. For instance, there is one from Madison Parish, [exhibiting the papers,] and so in the parish of Grant also, and in the parish of Point Coupee, and the parish of East Baton Rouge, which, if the committee will examine as experts, they will find it very evident in some cases that they were forged.

There was the last remark made to the committee, suggesting the forging of returns, of which he said they could be satisfied if they would examine the papers themselves as experts. The committee took no notice of the suggestion. Why? Because it had nothing to do with their judgment upon the question which had the prima facie case, which had the paper title. If they were investigating the question upon its merits to determine what was the true result of that election, this suggestion was of infinite moment; but without making any word of reply to that suggestion the chairman says:

We will now consider the evidence of the Louisiana investigation closed, as I am advised by both sides that they have laid all the testimony before the committee that they desire to present.

When those two parties had presented such testimony as they respectively saw fit to present, then the committee adjudged the case to be closed. Therefore they never reported to you on anything but a prima facie case, and you have before you to-day only just the case that committee reported to you.

The next proposition submitted to the Senate by the Senator from Ohio is entirely correct. He says that your Committee on Privileges and Elections in 1873 reported that there was no government in the State of Louisiana. If that committee were correct in that report, it follows beyond all doubt that neither Mr. Pinchback can have a seat here nor can Mr. McMillen have a seat here, nor could Mr. Ray or Mr. McMillen have been allowed to take the seat for that term which expired on the 4th of March, 1873. If there was no government in Louisiana, of course there could be no Senator appointed in any way to represent the State of Louisiana on this floor. I do not complain of the Senator from Ohio for making that statement. I wish, however, that he had dealt a little more candidly with the Senate. Considering that he advertised himself not exactly as the confessor of the Senate, but considering that he held himself up as the exponent of the real legal duty of the Senate, I think he ought to have been just at that point a little more candid with the Senate. I wish he would have told the Senate, for instance, whether he was prepared to-day to affirm what he says the committee reported in 1873. I wish he had given us the benefit of his opinion. Does he, and do our friends on the other side of this Chamber, who stand up always for law and for morals, mean to affirm the truth of that decision made by the majority of the committee in 1873? I wanted to ask the Senator when he was at that point in his remarks what he did mean to affirm. It is a little difficult to reply adequately to the argument of a gentleman who stands first on one foot and next on the other, who at one moment in his argument knocks ahead with an opinion of his own and in the next moment shelters himself behind the opinion of somebody else without telling us whether he vouches for it or not. I have the right to call the attention of the Senate to these points. I followed the lead of the majority of the committee. I voted in 1873 for that proposition of theirs. I avowed that fact a year ago. I did penance for it, as far as a Senator can do penance for a mistaken vote. I was not entirely satisfied; I was very much dissatisfied at the time with the vote I gave. You know the question was pressed upon us in the exigencies of the last days of a short session. The report of the committee came to our tables but a very few days before the session closed. No man except the members of the committee themselves had time to examine it. I for one went with the majority, thinking that I was more likely to be safe in that path than in any other, and the one thing that distressed me most, as I have said before on this floor, was the fear that I might be doing not injustice to Mr. Pinchback but injustice to Mr. McMillen. Listening to the debate had then as well as I could, I was not quite able to see that a case was made out against the claim of Mr. McMillen. I have seen that very clearly since, and I have stated it as well as I could to the Senate. I do not mean to repeat that statement this afternoon any further than to say this: that the question who was governor of Louisiana, and who constituted the Legislature of Louisiana in 1872, is not a question decided to my satisfaction by Judge Durell or by any other judge of any other court whatever. There was only one tribunal in the world which could determine who should be or who should not be the Legislature or the governor of that State, and that was the people of Louisiana. So far as this imperfect evidence can guide one to a result, I have gone through the evidence. I have said before, and I repeat here to-day, that upon that examination of the evidence I am profoundly convinced of two things: first, that when the ballot-boxes were closed in Louisiana on the night of November 4, 1872, a majority of the ballots resting in them were cast by republicans and for republican candidates. That is my conviction. One other opinion I have is, that during that day many thousands of republican voters with republican ballots in their hands were by force driven away from the polls and denied the poor privilege of depositing them. That is my conviction. I have stated here before the testimony upon which that conviction was based. I have never heard a reply to it, and I do not expect a reply to it here.

Then, I say, if you are disposed to inquire what the people of Louisiana decided on the 4th of November, 1872, I believe you will find that they decided that Kellogg should be governor and not McEnery; that a legislature republican in character should make the laws for that State, and not a legislature democratic in character. You have not made that inquiry yet, and until you do make that inquiry we must of course stand upon the case submitted to us in 1873 by the Committee on Privileges and Elections. What has resulted from that case? Briefly this: that a certain certificate, bearing the seal of Louisiana has been laid upon your table affirming that the Legislature of that State chose Mr. Pinchback to be Senator for the term of six years from the 4th of March, 1873. Mr. Pinchback was chosen by the Legislature of Louisiana to be Senator for six years from the 4th of March, 1873, and I understand that certificate is signed by Mr. Kellogg as governor of the State of Louisiana. Why does not that make a prima facie title to a seat? When the governor of Wisconsin puts his name to a certificate, sealed with the seal of that State, declaring that any one of her citizens is chosen by the Legislature to be a Senator, you do not ordinarily inquire any further. When the governor of Missouri does the like, the Senate for the time being believes the governor of Missouri, and takes the man so certified into the vacancy, if one exists, in the Senate. But is Kellogg governor of Louisiana? How do we know whether he is governor of Louisiana or not? I say he is governor de jure if a majority of the people of Louisiana voted for him in 1872. I say he is governor de jure if you add to the number of votes which were given for him the number of those voters who tried to vote for him and were illegally denied the right to vote for him, because your statute says so. I believe such was the fact; but then we have not tried that. Was he and is he governor de facto of the State of Louisiana? If so, do you not think it the bounden duty of the Senate, if it means to respect law, to respect that de facto title of the governor and admit the man in whose favor he certifies to the seat, at least until we have tried the title of the governor? Is there a man on this floor who is prepared to stand up here and say that Mr. Kellogg is not and has not been the governor of Louisiana, the acting, the de facto governor of Louisiana, from the time he signed that certificate in behalf of Mr. Pinchback? I have not heard that denied latterly. Early in this controversy it was denied, but there he has continued from that day to this to discharge the duties of governor; and it would seem as though in all these years, acting in the face of the world as a governor, that at least the de facto right to the office of governor might have been established.

Now, how much do we know about that particular Legislature which Governor Kellogg says elected Pinchback as a Senator? We know that in the face of Louisiana and in the face of the world that Legislature has made laws from that time to this, and one would think that a body of men which could make laws for a State, laws respected through the State, and laws recognized throughout the world, ought to be recognized precisely as the body of men to appoint a Senator for the State. What difficulty is known to exist in the title of that Legislature? The Senator from Ohio starts two objections. He says that the members of that Legislature were counted in by a board of returns defective in two particulars. First, he says himself that it consisted of but three men; and secondly, he says in the name of the majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections that it was unconstitutional. You see here two different objections maintained by two different authorities. One is that it is unconstitutional on the authority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, the other is that it consisted of but three members, and that stands on the authority of the Senator from Ohio. The Committee on Privileges and Elections may be right in their opinion; the Senator from Ohio is unquestionably wrong in his. The board consisted of more than three men. Under the laws of Louisiana the board was composed of five men, and they acted or did not act as seemed to them good. A quorum could act. How many were present at the time and every hour while this work was being done does not appear, is not known to the Senator from Ohio, is not known to the Senate. The Committee on Privileges and Elections may have been and were of opinion that the particular board which made that canvass was unconstitutional. The courts of Louisiana held it was constitutional, held that it was the one board authorized by law to make that canvass. The Senator from Ohio meets that fact in the only way in which he can meet it. He says that those judgments do not bind us. O, no; they do not bind the Senator from Ohio, I see; they do not bind Senators on the other side of this Chamber, perhaps; but if the Senator from Ohio means to establish a character with the people of the United States for respect for law, he can hardly do it by trampling on the judgments of the superior courts of a State upon a matter pertaining to their jurisdiction exclusively. We undoubtedly have the power to disregard any judgment which has been pronounced in a State by any tribunal there. When the Legislature of New York sends a man here to represent her, you can shut your doors in his face if you please; you can say that the man who certifies his credentials was not governor; you can say that the body which pretended to elect him was not the lawful Legislature. You can make any allegation you please. If you close your doors against the man, there is no appeal for him, for there is no tribunal with power higher than yours upon that question; and no man comes here, or at least it is seldom that a man comes here, with the papers establishing his title which have been declared to be valid by the judicial authorities of the State. Ordinarily you can exclude a man from these Chambers without slapping in the face any but the executive or the legislative authorities of the State; but when you turn Pinchback from these doors you trample upon the authority of the only man who has exerted a shadow of authority in Louisiana as a governor, upon the only body of men which has exerted the shadow of authority as a legislature, and you trample upon the judgment of all the courts in that State; every department of the government of Louisiana lies in the dust under the feet of him who denies the right of Pinchback to a seat on this floor.

Mr. President, the ghost of Durell has been paraded in the Chamber again to-day. It is a ghost honester than Banquo's. It has tried to get down, and would if you would let it. He has resigned; he has done everything he could to quit your sight. It does sometimes seem to me as though Durell was felt to be the very last, not to say the very best, card the Senators on the other side ever held in their hands or ever expected to hold. I have taken my turn once in denouncing Durell. I am not going to spend any more breath in that cause. I have not much left. I have this to say, however, to those of stronger lungs and a clearer sense of right than I have: You pile your anathemas upon Durell high as you please, Alps on Alps, and Ossa on Pelion, I will not help you, nor will I lift a finger to obstruct you. I will cheer you on in your way; but this I want to say, that if Durell's usurped action cannot confer title upon Pinchback, which I admit, may I not at least modestly claim that Durell's infamous usurpation cannot defeat Pinchback of a seat?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Would not that depend a little on whether he had produced it?

Mr. HOWE. Not at all. What did poor Durell do? There were in that poor mob-ridden State of Louisiana in the fall of 1872 two boards which claimed the right to count the votes for governor. Only one was lawful. Which one that was, you know to-day; every Senator on this floor knows, if he will respect the voice of the judicial power of the State. But there was another one claiming that authority. You know that that other one had no right to canvass the votes. So you have been told, not by Senators, nor by committees, but by the judicial department of the State, speaking with the authority of an ultimate tribunal, the court of last resort. The man who was playing governor of Louisiana happened to be in sympathy, not with the board which had the legal right to count the votes, but with that other board which had not the right to count the votes. That governor, in defiance of all the law there was in Louisiana, having some of the returns of election in his hands—for the law required those returns to be transmitted to him instead of submitting them to the board which of right might count them—gave them to that board which of right could not count them. There is nothing more explicit in law than is the commandment of the State of Louisiana, found in her statutes, which says that the board of returns, the legal board of returns, not the illegal one, having canvassed the votes for senators and representatives, shall make a list of those they find elected and shall return that list to whom? To the secretary of state. What shall he do with it? He shall transmit those names to the secretary of the old senate and to the clerk of the old house, and when the time arrives for the meeting of the Legislature that secretary has the simple duty of calling over the names of those senators so certified to him by the secretary of state; and the clerk of the house has to perform the same duty in his body.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What does the constitution of the State say upon the same subject?

Mr. HOWE. I have not the constitution in my hands, but I will hear it read if the Senator has it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely inquired for the purpose of getting an explanation.

Mr. HOWE. I do not know but that the constitutionality of this law is to be impeached; but that is the statute.

Both these boards, the one which the law authorized to count these returns and that which was not authorized, did make a count, with this difference: that the board which was authorized to count had not any lawful returns in its hand, and the board which was not authorized to count did have some of the returns in its hand. Both made lists; both transmitted them to men they called secretaries of state, but there was this difference: The Lynch board, by which I mean the republican board, sent the list of members which they found elected to the man who the courts of Louisiana have said over and over again was really the secretary of state. The other board, the De Feriet board, by which I mean the democratic board, sent its list of members to another man, who all the courts in Louisiana say was not secretary of state. As to the conduct of those boards, the Lynch board has been severely denounced. I join in the denunciation. I I have heard less of the De Feriet board, but I have looked into that volume, and I do not expect here or elsewhere to find a man who has examined it as I have who will not say, if he ventures to state the truth, that of all the rascalities which were committed in the count, and they were numerous enough God knows, the De Feriet board committed its full share. I do not impute the character to the returns made by either of those boards that they were actuated by a sense of justice or a desire to get at the truth, but those boards undoubtedly declared men to be elected who they knew in all conscience were not elected. I have not a doubt of that; but then there were those two lists made up. You may assert, and I will admit, that names contained on the list certified by the Lynch board had no business there; but such was the fact with exactly all the lists certified by the De Feriet board. Neither could call the other black. Neither could taunt the other with fraud.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Each could.

Mr. HOWE. Well, I will accept the amendment suggested by my friend from Vermont, who can always state facts more accurately than I ever can. Yes; I think he is right, that each could taunt the other with fraud; and when the one stood up and said to the other, "You are a knave," it was perfectly legitimate and entirely truthful for the other to retort, "You're another." I think on the whole it is the best statement of the case.

But these two lists were made up by these two boards. One of them was sent to the secretary of state, the other was not, but was sent to a sham and pretended secretary of state. That list which was sent to the secretary of state was transmitted to the clerk of the house and to the secretary of the senate; but then the sham and spurious legislature counted in by this sham and spurious De Feriet board, certified to by Jack Wharton, that sham and spurious secretary of state, was mustered in New Orleans waiting for the time to arrive when the Legislature should convene, backed up by whom? I know not by Federal bayonets, but none the less by bayonets, backed up, I admit, not by a soldiery commanded by the officers of the United States; backed up by a soldiery commanded by Warmoth's militia officers. They were preparing to meet and to make believe be the Legislature of Louisiana. The law told them not to meet. Why? Because they did not hold the certificate of the returning board. Some of them held it, because some of them held the certificate issued by the Lynch board. Those who held the certificate of the Lynch board were of course authorized to meet, but only those who held the certificate of the Lynch board were authorized by the law of Louisiana to take a seat either in the senate or in the house of representatives, except those senators who held over.

Such being the condition of things, two bodies holding by two different titles, one lawful, the other utterly unlawful, prepared to meet and to make believe be the Legislature of a State, in that condition of affairs Judge Durell seems to have thought in some luminous moment that he could outflank Warmoth, and he sat down and wrote an order commanding that all these sham statesmen who proposed to muster there under the license of the De Feriet board should keep out of the Legislature, and they were kept out of the Legislature. That order of Durell, I understand, was absolutely enforced by two soldiers. I am told that they had uniforms on, both of them—the uniform prescribed by your service—and they crossed bayonets over the door, and not one of those fellows, not one of those felons—I speak in the eye of Louisiana law when I call them so, because if they held the certificate of the Lynch board the bayonets did not prevent them from entering, and if they did not hold the certificate of the Lynch board the law of Louisiana told them not to enter—was admitted to the legislative hall. That order of Judge Durell usurped I admit, void unquestionably, mere paper, did prevent the usurpation of Warmoth, backed by Jack Wharton, backed by the De Feriet board; did prevent the assembling of a Legislature which had no semblance of authority or legality.

From that day to this the country has rung with denunciation of Judge Durell. I hope somebody feels more virtuous on account of it. I hope our democratic friends have been improved morally by the pile of anathemas they have heaped upon him. If they could find a leisure moment at some time to pronounce one feeble anathema upon that infamous band of conspirators who tracked the election of 1872 all the way through from the commencement of registration to the assembling of the Legislature; the men who cheated voters out of the right of registration by the thousand; the men who drove them from the ballot-boxes by the thousand; the men who forged returns; the men who cushioned returns; the men like Warmoth who disregarded all the law there was in the State over which he claimed to be executive—if they could find a leisure moment to breathe one single word of criticism upon this mountain of infamy, I believe it would do them good all the rest of their lives. Yes, when it is known that a band of burglars are about to break open a house at midnight, I admit if the Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court should issue an order commanding them not to do it, it would be a usurpation; he would have no business to do it; but, nevertheless, if the only effect of the order was to keep the burglars out of your house, would you find fault? Undoubtedly so strict a constructionist as the Senator from Ohio would say, "This is a gross prostitution of the judicial ermine." We could not deny that; it would be a prostitution of the judicial ermine; but after all, I should hope to find in the Senate of the United States, and even on the democratic side of the Chamber, some man who would not only agree that the judge had no business to issue the order, but who, on reflection, would admit that it was not a great crime to keep burglars out of the house.

That is all I have to say of Durell. He usurped authority which the law did not confer upon him, and the end of it is that not a man was kept out of the Legislature of Louisiana who had any right in that Legislature; and is there a lawyer on the other side of the Chamber who will dispute that statement of mine? If a man was kept out of that Legislature by that order of Durell, or by the soldiers who acted in pursuance of it, or by Packard, or anybody else, is there a lawyer on that side of the Chamber who does not know that the wrong would have been judicially redressed in the courts of the land long before this time? Sir, I hold a right to enter this Chamber as a Senator from Wisconsin. Do you think there is any judge in the District of Columbia who can organize a force, military or otherwise, which can deprive me of my seat here? Do you not know that the moment any man, no matter what judge tells him, no matter what uniform he wears, raises his hand, or authorizes another to raise his hand, to stay my entrance to this Chamber, that moment he must go before the judicial tribunals of the country to answer for this wrong. That would have been done with Durell; that would have been done with Packard; that would have been done with the soldiers who acted under their command and upon their license, only for this simple fact, that every lawyer in Louisiana knew that every man kept out of that Legislature was kept out not in violation of law, but in pursuance of law.

Mr. STEVENSON. Was not Durell arraigned?

Mr. HOWE. Arraigned where?

Mr. STEVENSON. By the only impeaching power under this Government—the House of Representatives of the United States.

Mr. HOWE. But why was he not arraigned by the gentlemen whose rights he trampled upon? Impeaching a judge is one thing. I do not wait for the House of Representatives to redress my wrongs when a judge shall illegally keep me from entering that door. I see a lawyer in my eye whom I would take into my employ at once. I would go to the judicial tribunal before which that judge would have to come. I would not wait for the House of Representatives to present him here for your judgment on impeachment; he should answer to me in damages.

Mr. President, I have lingered longer upon this case than I meant to do when I took the floor. I may be, after all, mistaken in some of these views of mine; but let no man assume for a moment that I do not believe I am right. I believe the most monstrous violation of the right of franchise ever perpetrated or ever attempted anywhere in the history of popular government was that perpetrated upon the people of Louisiana in 1872, when every avenue to the ballot-box was guarded by the democratic party of the State of Louisiana.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and twenty-six minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at five o'clock and twenty-three minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 7, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND, D. D.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

JAMES M. DOWNEY.

On motion of Mr. HUNTON, by unanimous consent, the Committee on War Claims were discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 743) for the relief of James M. Downey, of Loudoun County, Virginia.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled the joint resolution (H. R. No. 11) authorizing G. Harris Heap, United States consul at Tunis, to accept the trust of commissioner of the Bey of Tunis.

CUSTOMS COLLECTIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to House resolutions of December 15, 1875, and January 6, 1876, a statement showing collections and expenses of collections and the amount of goods examined in the ports of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not sure whether this communication should be sent to the Committee of Ways and Means or to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. Let it be printed, and then we can see where it properly belongs.

The communication was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

SURVEY OF RIVERS IN MICHIGAN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the requirement of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1875, a report of Major G. Weitzel of the cost of surveys of the Saginaw River, Michigan, Thunder Bay, Clinton River, and Au Sable River, Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

J. C. IRWIN AND WILLIAM PHILLIPS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a request of the Committee on Military Affairs, a report of the Acting Quartermaster-General on the bill (H. R. No. 161) for the relief of J. C. Irwin and William Phillips; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, for the information of the Committee on Commerce, a statement of the amounts appropriated for each river and harbor improvement from 1824 to and including March 3, 1875; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

SABINE PASS, TEXAS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, for the information of the Committee on Commerce, an estimate for continuing the improvements at Sabine Pass, Texas; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

SALE OF CADET ARMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, on the bill (H. R. No. 683) authorizing the sale of cadet arms; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

UPPER MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a memorial and joint resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, in reference to the improvement of the navigation of the Upper Mississippi River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes. This being Monday, the first business in order during the morning hour is the calling of the States and Territories, beginning with the State of Maine, for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to their appropriate committees, not to be brought back into the House by motions to reconsider. Under this

EXPIRATION OF THE MORNING HOUR.

Mr. KASSON. I rise to inquire whether the morning hour has not expired?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair.) The morning hour has just expired.

Mr. RANDALL. Was there not an understanding that this call for bills and resolutions should go entirely through the States, regardless of the morning hour?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that not being here at the time he is not able to answer the question as to whether an agreement was entered into by which this call should continue until the list of States and Territories was completed.

Mr. KASSON. I believe there was no agreement to-day.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust there will be unanimous consent to make the order now that the call of States and Territories be continued until it is completed.

Mr. KASSON. I must ask the consideration of my resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Iowa object to the call of States and Territories being completed by unanimous consent?

Mr. KASSON. I object, unless I have unanimous consent after it is completed to offer my resolution.

Mr. GARFIELD. That will be granted, I presume.

Mr. KASSON. Then I withdraw my objection, on the understanding that I shall be at liberty to offer this resolution on the completion of the call of States and Territories.

Mr. COCHRANE. I am directed by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice to report back House bill No. 551 for the relief of James Clifford, of Arkansas, and move that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KASSON. I rise to offer some resolutions, and to move a suspension of the rules thereon.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before that is done, I wish to introduce bills for reference at this time.

The SPEAKER. Several gentlemen who were not in their seats when their States were called desire to introduce bills for reference.

Mr. KASSON. I will yield for that purpose.

FRANCIS ARMSTRONG.

Mr. HOLMAN (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1977) for the relief of Francis Armstrong; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REPRINTING TARIFF BILL.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that House bill No. 1711, to reduce and simplify existing laws imposing duties on imports and to reduce taxation be reprinted for the use of the House, the number already printed having been exhausted.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MARY E. CAMPBELL.

Mr. BRIGHT introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1985) granting a pension to Mary E. Campbell; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JAPANESE INDEMNITY FUND.

Mr. COX presented resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York and the report of the committee on the Japanese indemnity fund; which was referred to the Committe on Foreign Affairs.

ASA O. GALLUP.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1986) for the relief of the heirs of Asa O. Gallup; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

CURRENCY AND SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. KASSON. I move that the rules be so suspended that the House may be brought to a separate vote upon the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the constitutional authority of Congress to "coin money, regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin" does not include the authority to issue the paper of the Government as money; and in the judgment of this House the Constitution nowhere confers upon Congress the power to issue in time of peace the promises or obligations of the Government as a legal tender in payment of debts.

Resolved, That any legislation touching the legal-tender currency of the Government should keep steadily in view the resumption of specie payments and should tend to enhance the value of that currency, for the redemption of which the faith of the United States has been pledged to its citizens.

Mr. KASSON. My motion is that the House suspend the rules so as to proceed to vote separately upon the two resolutions.

Mr. HOLMAN. I was about to suggest that the proposition ought to be divided.

Mr. COX. This very important subject is now being considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency. I hope these resolutions will be referred to that committee.

The SPEAKER. The motion, as the Chair understands, is that the rules be suspended and that these two resolutions be agreed to by separate votes.

Mr. KASSON. It is that the rules be so suspended that the House proceed to vote separately upon the two resolutions.

Mr. COX. I hope the House will refuse to suspend the rules. Let the resolutions go to the appropriate committee.

Mr. PAGE. I object to debate.

Mr. FORT. We ought to have the opinion of the Judiciary Committee on this question.

Mr. KASSON. I must object to debate, and call for the regular order.

Mr. SOUTHARD. In view of the recent decision of the Supreme Court, I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] whether his resolution is not an implied censure upon that court?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. KASSON. I second the call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The first question is, Will the House so suspend the rules as that thereafter separate votes shall be taken on the pending resolutions?

Mr. RANDALL. Then the only question now is on suspending the rules to have afterward a separate vote on the two resolutions?

The SPEAKER. The first question is on the motion to suspend the rules so as to bring these two resolutions before the House, that separate votes may be taken thereon. The suspension is not exhausted upon the first vote. Are the yeas and nays demanded?

Mr. HOLMAN. With the proposition in that shape, I do not ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HUBBELL and Mr. KELLEY called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order. I understand that the present vote does not go to the merits of the question.

Mr. KASSON. If this vote be in the negative, it will be a rejection of the resolutions.

Mr. COX. Not a bit of it.

Mr. RANDALL. The subject will be left to the consideration of the appropriate committee.

The question was taken; and there were yeas—97, nays 146, not voting 46; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Bagby, George A. Bagley, John H. Baker, William H. Baker, Ballou, Bell, Blaine, Blair, Bradley, Horatio C. So (two-thirds not having voted in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

During the vote,

Mr. HUNTON said that his colleague [Mr. CABELL] had been called home by sickness in his family.

Mr. SCALES stated that his colleague, [Mr. DAVIS,] who was absent by leave of the House, would, if present, have voted in the negative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman from Iowa will agree to the reference of his resolution, I will move that it be referred either to the Committee of Ways and Means or to his own committee.

Mr. KASSON. I will be glad to have it referred to the gentleman's committee.

Objection was made.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, notifying the House that that body had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1053) providing for the payment of judgments rendered under section 11 of chapter 459 of the laws of the Forty-third Congress, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (S. No. 62) to authorize George P. Marsh to accept a certain present from the government of Switzerland and a certain present from the government of Italy; when the Speaker signed the same.

3.65 BONDS.

Mr. BUCKNER. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee for the District of Columbia to report back joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of said commissioners, and for other purposes, with the recommendation that the amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in and the House ask for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. BRIGHT. Let the amendments of the Senate be read.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, the report will be received and the joint resolution as well as the Senate amendments will be read.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

That the commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby directed to transfer to the Treasurer of the United States, for the payment of the interest due the 1st of February, 1876, on the bonds of said District, issued under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," the sum necessary to pay the same from any unexpended appropriations heretofore made by Congress, or from any revenues derived by taxation on the property of said District of Columbia, subject to the requisition of said commissioners, excluding funds raised for the support of public schools: Provided, That any further issue of 3.65 bonds is hereby prohibited: And provided further, That nothing in this resolution contained shall involve the Government of the United States in any obligation to pay principal or interest of any such bonds which have been issued contrary to or not in pursuance of law.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

Strike out after the word "school," in line 15 to the end of the resolution, these words:

Provided, That any further issue of 3.65 bonds is hereby prohibited: And provided further, That nothing in this resolution contained shall involve the Government of the United States in any obligation to pay principal or interest of any such bonds which have been issued contrary to or not in pursuance of law.

And in lieu thereof insert:

That any further issue of 3.65 bonds under or by virtue of said act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, is hereby prohibited: And provided, That the certificates heretofore issued by the board of audit, including those converted into 3.65 per cent. bonds and those which have not been so converted, and the certificates hereafter to be issued by the board of audit or their successors in office, shall not exceed in the aggregate, $5,000,000.

Add the following section to the resolution:

SEC. 2. That there shall be no increase of the present amount of the total indebtedness of the District of Columbia, and any officer or person who shall knowingly increase or aid or abet in increasing such total indebtedness shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding ten years and by fine not exceeding $10,000: Provided, That the board of audit created by the act for the government of the District of Columbia approved June 20, 1874, is hereby abolished, and shall immediately upon the approval of this resolution transmit all the books and property in their possession belonging to the District to the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and make a report of their proceedings not hitherto made.

And provided further, That this resolution shall not in any way or manner recognize the liability of the United States to pay either the principal or interest of any of such bonds as may have been issued on or since the 27th day of January, 1876.

Mr. BUCKNER. In accordance with the recommendation of the Committee for the District of Columbia, I move the amendments of the Senate be disagreed to and the House ask for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on said joint resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces as the committee of conference on the part of the House Mr. BUCKNER, Mr. CATE, and Mr. WILLARD.

GOVERNMENT HOSPITAL FOR THE INSANE, ETC.

Mr. STEVENSON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be, and is hereby, instructed to examine into the expenditures and management since the year 1862 of the Government Hospital for the Insane, the Deaf and Dumb Institute, and also the expenditures and management, since the respective dates of their creation, of the Columbia Hospital for Women, the board of health of the District of Columbia, the Reform School, and the Freedmen's Hospital, for all of which institutions annual appropriations have been made by Congress, and report to this body the total amount of expenditures for each institution up to the present time and the actual annual cost to the Government of each inmate or patient in said institutions, together with the number of all persons (other than laborers) employed therein and the salary received by each employé; and the committee be empowered to send for such persons and papers as they may deem necessary.

COMMITTEE APPOINTMENTS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say to the House that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MCCRARY] asks to be excused from further service on the Committee for the District of Columbia, because his labors on the other committee of which he is a member are so great as to leave him insufficient time to attend to those of the latter committee. Is there any objection to his being excused?

There was no objection, and he was excused accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the vacancy in the Committee on the Judiciary, caused by the death of the late Mr. Starkweather, of Connecticut.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] asks to be excused from further service on the Committee of Elections, of which he is now a member.

There was no objection, and he was excused accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints to the place thus made vacant on the Committee of Elections Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. He appoints to the place just made vacant in the Committee for the District of Columbia Mr. CRAPO, of Massachusetts

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I now move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to proceed with the consideration of the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. PIERCE. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to offer a resolution.

Mr. BRIGHT, I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. PIERCE. I hope not; the gentleman from Pennsylvania has already yielded to me.

Mr. RANDALL. I am willing to yield to the gentleman, but the demand for the regular order of business is an objection.

Mr. BRIGHT. I withdraw it.

EMMA MINE AND MACHADO CLAIM.

Mr. PIERCE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to ascertain and report what action, if any, has been taken by the executive department of the Government in relation to the connection of the United States minister at the Court of St. James with the directory of the Emma mine, so called, and also with the prosecution of the Machado claim against the British government; and that said committee be authorized to request the Secretary of State to furnish this House such information and correspondence upon the subject as may not be incompatible with the public interest.

LATE J. W. HEAD AND S. M. FITE.

Mr. RIDDLE. I ask unanimous consent to offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be directed to insert the following item in the bill making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877:

To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay to the widows of John W. Head and Samuel M. Fite, late members-elect of this House from the fourth district of Tennessee, a sum each equal to the salary of a member of Congress for three months, being $1,250 to each of said widows.

Mr. RIDDLE. The gentlemen whose names appear in the resolution were elected to represent the fourth congressional district of Tennessee in the present Congress. John W. Head died a few days after his election. Samuel M. Fite was elected the 31st December, 1874, and died the 23d October, 1875. Neither lived to take his seat. It is an event unparalleled in the history of this Government. I believe it is usual to agree to resolutions of this character, and I think the extraordinary circumstances of this case justify the adoption of this resolution without objection by any member of this House.

There was no objection, and the resolution was adopted.

THE LATE HON. JAMES BUFFINTON.

Mr. FORT, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas Hon. James Buffinton, a member-elect to this Congress from the first district of the State of Massachusetts, died on the 7th day of March, 1875, after a service of many years in this House, leaving a widow and children surviving; and whereas Hon. WILLIAM W. CRAPO, who was elected to fill the vacancy in said district, has voluntarily covered into the Treasury his pay from the 8th day of March to the 2d day of November last, amounting to $3,136.98: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be instructed to provide in the miscellaneous appropriation bill to pay to Mrs. Sarah Buffinton, widow of the said James Buffinton, deceased, $1,876.71, which, with the three month's pay allowed the said widow by existing law, amounts to the sum which was covered into the Treasury by said sitting member.

PRINTING OF UNITED STATES BONDS, ETC.

Mr. BRIGHT, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department be, and they are hereby, instructed to make a careful and minute examination of the method adopted by the Treasury Department to print the bonds, notes, and securities of the United States; what guards have been adopted to prevent frauds or mistakes; whether there has been any fraudulent issue of notes, bonds, or coupons, and, if so, by whose fault or negligence, and the proper remedy and prevention thereof; and especially to examine the official conduct of those charged with the printing, registering, and issue of any notes, bonds, or securities of the United States; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, to examine the same, to take testimony, to employ an expert, whose compensation shall be fixed by the Committee on Accounts, and leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

MAIL CONTRACTORS IN SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I move that the rules be suspended and the following resolution adopted:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be respectfully requested to furnish the House of Representatives with a statement showing the amount due contractors for carrying the United States mails in Southern States at the beginning of the civil war, and which has not been paid in consequence of such contractors being unable to take the oath required by law.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman from Texas allow me to say that that very information was obtained near the close of the last Congress, and was in the Committee on Appropriations when we adjourned. It was all there, accompanied by a letter from the Post-Office Department.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. If the information is already there, I will avail myself of it. Meanwhile I withdraw the resolution.

NEW YORK POST-OFFICE.

Mr. METCALFE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings be authorized to inquire into the amounts of money expended for the erection and completion of the New York post-office, and for this purpose they are authorized to employ a clerk, at a salary of not more than five dollars per day, and to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and do all other needful and necessary acts.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill. And in this connection I wish to say that the committee desire that to-day shall be occupied with general debate on this bill, and that to-morrow we shall make an effort to consider the bill under the five-minute rule for amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. HOSKINS in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I shall confine myself to the consideration of but a few questions in connection with this bill, and those of a very general character.

It is impossible at this time to approach any bill appropriating money without considering in some degree at least the present condition of public affairs and the extent to which efforts should be made to reduce the expenditures of the Government. A very great statesman, who had spent a long life-time in the public service, Thomas H. Benton, in speaking near the close of his career of the growth of our Federal expenditures at the time when the expenditures of the Government had reached about $60,000,000, uses the following language, which I quote from the great work of his later years:

At the same time it is the opinion of this writer that a practical man, acquainted with the objects for which the Federal Government was created and familiar with its financial working from the time our fathers put it into operation, could take his pen and cross out nearly the one-half of these sixty-odd millions, and leave the Government in full vigor for all its proper objects, and more pure by reducing the number of those who live upon the substance of the people.

Since that was written the ordinary expenditures of this Government have expanded beyond $60,000,000 per annum and reached the present more enormous sum of $179,166,209.90 for the ordinary administration of our public affairs, independent of the public debt.

This capital, sir, is not the best point perhaps for deliberation upon the subjects that closely concern the industries of our people and the weight that rests upon them. We are here in the midst of a city where vast expenditures of money are made by the Government in countless forms, and the depression and stagnation of business in every field of industry, the want and destitution of multitudes of laboring-men unable to keep the wolf from the door because labor cannot find employment, the actual suffering among our people for want of food and raiment, are less prominent in this capital than perhaps anywhere else. And for that reason it is well to consider the expression of opinion which comes up to us daily through the public press as indicating the judgment of the country upon the absolute necessity of severe and positive retrenchment in expenditures of Government. We are assured, sir, that the people are absolutely unable to meet the present burden of taxation. The gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] in discussing the Military Academy bill, spoke very well and clearly of the retrenchment which have been made during the last two years. And he remarked cautiously—and his experience is such as justifies confidence in his opinion—that still further retrenchment might be made. And yet I think the honorable gentleman was rather too cautious and inclined to place too much stress upon the assumption that further retrenchment would be found more difficult as the field for retrenchment had been already severely gleaned, for in fact no discretion is left us. We must reduce the burdens that rest upon the country. We must reduce the expenditures heavily, and we can without impairing the efficiency of any function of government. I speak in moderation when I say that our form of government is in peril. Without reference to the public debt or those expenditures which inevitably resulted from the war, excepting the pension list, the cost of government is alarming. In the years 1860 and 1861, the first years of Mr. Lincoln's administration, the appropriations reached little beyond $62,000,000. In 1869 and 1870, with the Army and Navy larger than they now are, the expenditures of the Government had been reduced to $164,658,273.84, and in 1871–'72 they were reduced to $153,037,346.15; and yet, instead of a continued reduction, as the country justly expected, for the present fiscal year the appropriations reach $179,166,209.90. The highest point reached since 1869 was in 1873–'74, when the enormous sum of $194,217,210.27 was expended. I append the table of the expenditures, including 1860–'61 and omitting the years of the war and the years immediately succeeding, that the expenditures in times of peace may be compared with those expenditures, including pensions but excluding the public debt:

Expenditures for the year 1860–'61 and from 1869–'70 to 1875–'76.

Appropriations for 1875–'76, $179,166,209.90.

In 1871–'72 the expenditures were, as I have said, reduced to $153,037,346.15, but, unhappily, the appropriation for the present fiscal year reached $179,166,209.90, and the estimates for the next year are $180,516,972.76, so that it must be borne in mind that, after the reduction made under the influence of the public vigilance and pressure demanding economy, yet the appropriations for the present fiscal year, made by the last Congress, reached the sum I have named; and yet, Mr. Chairman, no gentleman can assert that the Government was more efficiently administered in 1873–'74, with over one hundred and ninety-four millions, than in 1871–'72, with little over one hundred and fifty-three millions. Mr. Benton was certainly right in his theory. In the meantime the capacity of the country to bear heavy taxation has been greatly diminished, for year by year oppressive taxation is exhausting the productive energies of the country.

Sir, we must resist this tendency to increase expenditures, go back along the track we have traveled. It is not now, as it has been at some periods, a matter which might or might not arrest the attention of members of the House. It comes in a form that Congress cannot evade. Through the unfortunate example of the General Government, throughout the country the local expenditures and indebtedness have reached an alarming magnitude. States, counties, townships, cities, towns, and villages have followed the perilous example until every industry staggers under the load of Federal and local taxation, and it is positively asserted that the aggregate taxation exceeds the products of the industries of the country. No nation can stand that. I do not assert that Congress is responsible for the general tendency to extravagance and profligate expenditure throughout the country in local government, but it must be admitted that the example set by the National Legislature has contributed largely to that unfortunate result, and a great example set by the Federal Government of severe frugality cannot fail to check the present fatal tendency, and it must be checked or universal bankruptcy and dishonor must follow. It was our boast through the first three-quarters of the first century of our Government that a republic was the most frugal, economical, and purest of governments, simplicity, frugality, and virtue its sure foundations. We are in peril that it shall be charged that a government of the people is liable to be more profligate of expenditure and the people more oppressed by taxation than in governments where the people are not the masters. Will any representative of the people consent that that shall be possible?

I hold in my hand a copy of the Boston Journal of Commerce, a careful gatherer of the current opinions of our times, and I find in it the following startling statement, startling and suggestive, and at the same time not flattering to the American people. Yet we can well afford to learn from any source how extravagant we are if it shall aid us to reform. This paper remarks that we and our fathers had boasted of the economy and purity of republican government resting on the intelligence and virtue of the people, and adds:

> There was certainly some foundation for some such boasting comparisons in the early days of the Republic, but there is none now, and it is very unfortunate for Americans when any of them are instituted. Some one having drawn a picture of the government in "free America" and of that of "monarchical England," the Edinburgh Scotsman, with its natural ken and shrewdness, catches up the writer and pours out upon him some solid as well as disagreeable facts, in this wise:
> "The imperial revenue of Great Britain is about £75,276,000, and the amount raised by taxation for local purposes is about £28,186,000; so that the whole cost of governing the country, with what our American friends regard as our expensive luxuries of a monarchy, is £103,452,700. But the revenue of the Federal Government of the United States is £57,895,850, and the amount raised by taxation for local purposes is about £71,000,000; so that the whole cost of the 'self-government' of the Americans is £129,000,000. We have an efficient army and navy—the Americans have neither; we have our colonies and our great Eastern Empire, while the United States have no colony; and still we get along with tolerable comfort by the expenditure of £25,000,000 a year less than the Republic."

"Thus" says that journal "it unhappily appears that our federal and local expenditures exceed the corresponding expenditures of Great Britain $125,000,000 a year." I am glad that the Scotsman somewhat overestimates our expenditures, but still it is in fact so great, and the tendency and motives to increase the volume are so fearfully pressing and growing year after year, that the friends of free government may well take the alarm.

This Boston journal commenting upon that very striking and very unpleasant picture further says:

> Great Britain carries on her powerful and complicated government at $125,000,000 less expense annually than it costs to support the local and national administration of government in the United States, and the worst phase of our condition is the stolid and persistent determinations with which the office "rings" of all parties oppose every movement for any practical retrenchment.

I trust that such a statement cannot much longer be made with any approach to truth, and I indulge in the hope and belief that both the great political parties of the country, as represented in this House, in considering the appropriation bills which will come up during the present session of Congress, will manifest a determination that these heavy expenditures shall be heavily reduced.

I find upon our desks a leading journal stating the further startling fact that our taxation, including local taxation in all its forms and Federal tax, amounts annually to the sum of $730,000,000, exceeding, indeed, the estimate of the Scotsman. What does this mean?

The net earnings of the United States in 1869, when the last effort was made by the Government through the Bureau of Statistics to ascertain the annual value of our earnings as a people, were found to be $546,000,000, while the taxation of the Federal Government since 1870 has been materially reduced, the taxation of State and of local governments had very materially increased, so that the whole amount of taxation was then and is still about $730,000,000, actually exceeding in amount the whole earnings of the people of this country. This is certainly overstated, but still is it not time that a severe effort should be made for a retrenchment of the expenditures of the Government if these figures make any approach to truth? Nothing is more certain than that taxation is at the bottom of the universal prostration of all the industries of this country. It is not panic, but exhaustion, that produces this prostration. There is no road to solid prosperity for our people, there is none to the resumption of specie payments, which gentlemen so long for, except by positive and remorseless reduction of taxation, Federal and local. Free government itself is involved in the demand for retrenchment and reform.

The pending bill reduces the expenditure for our foreign diplomacy from $1,352,485 to $922,847 a reduction of $429,639.

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MONROE,] to whom I always listen with great pleasure on account of his fairness and the consideration which he brings to every question of public concern, has made objection to the retrenchment proposed by this bill on the ground that it tends to cripple the commerce of the United States, that it tends to impair the facilities for reviving our commerce with foreign countries. He dwells upon the fact that this bill abolishes our minister-resident at Greece. That gentleman, usually so cautious, indulged in a remark which struck me with astonishment. The Committee on Appropriations were not unaware that this proposition to retrench in such a field might excite, at first blush at least, some opposition. My friend from Ohio is not peculiar in his feeling of reverence and veneration for all that pertains to ancient Greece. The gentleman in speaking of a resolution for a minister to Greece says:

And another name which has been heard in this country, Henry Clay, of Kentucky, followed Mr. Webster and made one of the grandest speeches of his life in support of that resolution. Why, sir, hardly anybody at that time, outside of a certain circle of liberty-loving men, believed Greece could maintain her freedom. It was only subsequent events, and very honorable events they were to the powers which took part in them, which demonstrated this fact. And yet these great statesmen were in favor of incurring the expense of sending to her a diplomatic representative.

For what? Because, as my friend has suggested, they indulged in the hope that the independence and liberty of Greece would be in fact established. The people of this country will sympathize with the struggles of every people to throw off the yoke of oppression and to establish a free government. But does my friend overlook the fact that the anticipations of the men of that day were never realized? Greece was struggling for independence under the leadership of men of that day, some natives of Greece and many more of other nations who were inspired by the illustrious example of the early days of that famous people. But the gentleman from Ohio is certainly aware that it is not to the Greece that the statesmen of the last generation hoped for, we send a minister invested with diplomatic powers. The gentleman who is accredited from the United States to the modern Athens is certainly not a representative from the United States to anything of the Greece that excites our admiration or kindled the enthusiasm of Clay and Webster. Greece a republic would excite the admiration and even reverence of all Americans and the lovers of freedom throughout the world.

Greece of to-day, so far as territory is concerned, is in some degree the Greece of the olden time, but the Greece we venerate is no more. A small body of people, less than one and a half millions, dwelling amid the venerable ruins and upon the tomb of the ancient republics, submitting to a monarchical government under the tutelage and protection of three great European powers. Is this the Greece that gave learning to the nations? My friend knows that England keeps her vessels at Piræus not only to protect but to overawe that little monarchy.

We are asked to send a minister to a little monarchy with a scion of the house of Denmark at its head; a petty prince kept in power by England, Russia, and France. Is this respect to the memory of Greece? All that was valuable and venerable in Greece except her ruins is gone to more favored climes. It is but a petty monarchy kept in power over a people, incapable perhaps of government, by stronger governments—Russia, France, and England. Is it for the representatives of the people of the United States to impose taxes upon their people for the mere empty representation at a court such as this?

There is no sentiment or poetry in such diplomacy. It is not Greece, but a feeble monarch we would honor—a monarch who reigns by the right of Russia, England, and France, not by the voice of a people.

We propose to establish a consulate at Athens. We have one at Piræus, as my friend well knows. We have done all that is necessary to promote our commerce with Greece, if such commerce was possible. Have we anything to do with that country except commercially? Have we any possible political relations, present or remote, with George of Denmark, who is kept upon the throne of Greece? Why, my friend must see that he proposes simply to send, at an expense of $7,500 a year, an American citizen to give character to this little petty monarchy; nothing more. What valuable information does my friend think we shall get from that source? What fruit does he expect from this diplomacy that costs us $7,500 a year for the salary of minister and the usual incidental expenses?

Mr. MONROE rose.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my friend will excuse me a moment?

Mr. MONROE. Will it disturb the gentleman if I make a single remark at this point?

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman will allow me to finish this sentence.

What kind of service, Mr. Chairman, is rendered to this Government by this representative to the little monarchy of Greece? I have before me one of these state-papers, dispatches of Government—one of these mysterious documents that seem to overawe our sense of economy. Let us read what valuable facts come to us from this little monarchy at a cost of $7,500 a year and contingent expenses. See what a voice comes from that land of scholars and nurse of arms:

Mr. Read to Mr. Fish.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Athens, April 25, 1875. (Received May 27.)

This dispatch is so important that the time of its being received is mentioned!

SIR: The king and the queen attended the imposing ceremonies at the cathedral last evening, the Greek Easter eve. They arrived in a state carriage, preceded by outriders and followed by a strong escort of cavalry.

The scene was a most impressive one as they ascended the steps of the broad platform before the cathedral, accompanied by the various members of their court in brilliant dress, and were received with appropriate solemnities by the Metropolitan and his clergy. The king—

How important to be minute and careful in speaking of kings, when a gentleman is employed at a salary of $7,500 a year, to note the movements of a king and report them to our Department of State—

The king was in the uniform of a general officer—

That is valuable information. The State Department must have been greatly edified by this valuable intelligence!

The king was in the uniform of a general officer, with the ribbon of his royal order on his breast. The white satin robes of the queen seemed to steal the color from her cheek.

[Laughter.]

My friend from New York [Mr. COX] suggests that this was very gay. He must not indulge in such levity. This is a solemn state paper—a costly and valuable one. This is a specimen of the special dispatches sent by our high-salaried ministers at the expense of the industrious people of this country.

The white satin robes of the queen seemed to steal the color from her cheeks.

You can see that this famous diplomat was inspired by the old poets of that country. Anacreon could scarcely have expressed a handsomer simile. We can see the effect of Grecian literature in this ambitious diplomat.

The dignitaries of the church were clad in magnificent embroidered garments.

[Laughter.]

Gentlemen must not smile. This is a state paper and about as dignified and important as others I have been able to find in this ponderous volume. [Laughter.]

The archbishop wore, moreover—

"Moreover" is a good word in that connection—

The archbishop wore, moreover, his miter, and carried the staff of office in his hand. Golden banners and richly decorated religious emblems glistened on all sides, reflecting countless torches in the hands of the assembled multitude. From the latticed balconies of an ancient Venetian building, on the opposite side of the square, streamed fitfully the many-hued glare of chemical fires. But far above the splendors of the present shone the majestic outlines of the Acropolis and its immortal ruins, illumined by the calm, silvery rays of the same fair moon which looked down upon the labors, ceremonies, and sacrifices of Phidias and Pericles two thousand years ago.

Here we touch upon the real Greece a little.

In the vicinity of the cathedral, from an early hour, every available space was packed with a living mass—

Now, I call the attention of my friend from Ohio, and want him to observe how far this is republican Greece that we all revere and love—yet not a murmur arose.

Either the people of that little monarchy were so completely subjugated that "not a murmur arose," or else they were beholding with contempt this pageantry to which we contributed by sending a representative there at $7,500 a year.

Yet not a murmur arose from the vast crowd, and no disturbance, not even the most trivial, took place.

What an important fact that was to convey to the State Department.

At the close of the rites, their majesties returned to the palaces.

Everything must be detailed.

At the close of the rites their majesties returned to the palace, while their subjects retired to their homes to celebrate with feasting and joyous songs the arrival of Easter, after many weeks of rigid fasting.

I have, &c.,

JOHN MEREDITH READ.

There are five or six other equally valuable state-papers in that volume from the same source. Does my friend from Ohio think that the overtaxed people of this country can afford to pay a gentleman $7,500 a year to get up these puerile descriptions of the fetes of a petty monarchy? I sympathize with him when he talks about old Greece; but I am not willing to tax the people of the country for the purpose of adding to the petty pomp of this little prince.

Mr. MONROE. Will my friend allow me a word?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly; but only a word, I hope.

Mr. MONROE. In reply to my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] I wish to utter just two sentences. First, Henry Clay, who has been alluded to, avowed it on repeated occasions as a principal motive for extending the diplomatic representation of the United States, that in his judgment it would prepare the way for the increase of our commerce; that motive must be superadded to the interest in Grecian liberty.

One sentence more. I do not infer, nor I presume would it be my friend's method of reasoning to infer, that, because there has been an official in some department of service that lacked good sense or did not discharge his duty, therefore that department of the service should be abolished. If that were a sound method of reasoning, then, if we were to believe half of what the newspapers say, this House and the whole Congress of the United States would have to be abolished.

Mr. HOLMAN. What else would this gentleman (Mr. Read) do? Why, sir, we have a consul at Piræus; we always have had, I believe. We propose a consul at Athens at $2,000 a year in hope that some time we may have some commerce there. "Too much," my friend from New York [Mr. COX] says, and I think it is myself. We know there is no commerce between this country and Greece. The fees of all our consuls there do not reach $180 a year. My friend must remember that of that million and a half of people a large portion are of the Slavic race, wandering shepherds of the mountains, scarcely more enlightened than our western Indian tribes.

My friend must remember that between the Slavic race who settled in that country and the furious crusaders who overran and partitioned Greece among their chiefs and the cruel Turks all that was beautiful and grand in Greece has perished; no, gone to more favored climes. It is here in this blessed land of ours, it is everywhere where intelligence prevails and love of learning exists. You do not find it by going back to that ancient tomb of greatness. It has left the Egean Sea to return no more. "Westward the course of empire takes it way." But, sir, upon this general question I take issue fairly with my friend from Ohio. I will go further than he will, or as far as he will, in behalf of any agency that will encourage and promote our commerce. The position of the United States in its relations to the other nations of the globe is such as naturally to make it not only a great producing but a great commercial power; but I deny that these ministers sent abroad do anything to aid our commerce. I deny it; I take issue with the gentleman. I am willing to multiply our consuls, commercial agents, and vice-consuls, or whatever other agency will connect us with the commerce of the world. But do you suppose that Mr. Read has anything to do with our commerce? Do you suppose that the thirty-one ministers you send abroad, with salaries from $7,500 to $17,500 a year, influence the commerce of the world? It is your commercial agent, your consul-general, your consul, who connect us with the commerce of the nations, and not your expensive and showy ministers. Why, Mr. Chairman, you may abolish all these ministers, whether envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary or merely ministers resident, without affecting the commercial interest of the country a particle. If occasion arises for diplomacy, which seldom does, you can send a minister. The nations are closer together than in the Middle Ages. It should be remembered that the salaries of our foreign ministers are paid in gold.

Take Japan as an instance; our minister out there gets $12,000 a year. My friend from Ohio likes to talk about Japan. The present representative of this country to the court of Japan is our old friend Hon. John A. Bingham, the most amiable and genial gentleman living. He is the minister plenipotentiary who now so eminently and pleasantly represents us at the court of Japan at $12,000 a year. Let us see whether in this correspondence he gives utterance to any of those sublime thoughts which he used to pour out in debate upon the floor of this House in eulogy of our republican institutions. Let us see what has been the effect of a slight residence abroad near an imperial court in his case.

I will read from this book of state papers:

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Tokei, January 2, 1875. (Received February 8.)

SIR: I have the honor to report that, in pursuance of an invitation extended to me by His Majesty the Emperor through the minister for foreign affairs, I joined my colleagues at the imperial palace on the 1st instant to tender my congratulations to the Emperor.

My colleagues and myself being duly presented to His Majesty, Sir Harry Parkes, as dean of the diplomatic corps—

A very dignified body unquestionably; all in elegant uniforms except Mr. Bingham, who of course was a plain, simple, dignified republican, such as should represent a republic before an emperor, and I am sure Mr. Bingham has not forgot that he represents a republic.

Sir Harry Parkes, as dean of the diplomatic corps, read to His Majesty, on behalf of himself and colleagues, an address, a copy of which is herewith inclosed; to which His Majesty, as will be seen from a copy of his reply herewith, was pleased to express his thanks and congratulations.

You will observe that Mr. Bingham calls especial attention to another great and valuable fact—

You will observe that the Emperor, in the address of last year as also in the address of this year, expressly named presidents as well as sovereigns as the chief executives of friendly states represented at his court.

Now my friend from Ohio sees the point of that. It shows the impression Mr. Bingham is making upon even His Imperial Highness. Mr. Bingham has only been there two years, and had only once before, I presume, the honor of being in the presence of His August Majesty the Emperor of Japan. Yet Mr. Bingham's presence there has already secured this important result, a fact which must have greatly edified and delighted the State Department, that the Emperor of Japan had actually included presidents as persons to be named in connection with sovereigns of friendly powers represented at his court! Cannot we afford to pay $12,000 a year to have such an impression made on the Emperor of Japan with a flattering result?

If there is anything ridiculous it is these so-called state papers, and this is one of the most solemn of them all. [Laughter.] However, there is a passage which I omitted. "It gives me pleasure," says Mr. Bingham, and how must the heart of the State Department have throbbed at this gushing intelligence—

It gives me pleasure to note that on this occasion Her Majesty the Empress was present.

And yet this is the book of the intercourse of nations in diplomacy; these are the national dispatches for which we are to pay a million dollars a year.

My friend next comes to South America. Does he imagine these ministers—this little vestige of the Middle Ages—have anything to do with taking care of our commerce in South America?

Mr. MONROE. They ought to have.

Mr. HOLMAN. The cannot have. They are employed in South America as elsewhere in attending to affairs of state just as they are engaged in Japan and Greece. They are mere secretaries, to note and transmit to our State Department the movements of imperial persons, or in republics the petty intrigues of men in power. Strange, then, that the people of this country should be taxed for any such purpose.

There was a time in the history of the nations—even now among monarchies and the contending powers of Europe—when the efforts of diplomacy were well enough and when ministers and embassadors were valuable in the complications and bloody ambition of princes, and the more perfidious and unscrupulous the more valuable. This was among crowned heads, unmindful of the people. We have left all that behind; that time has gone by with us, and here in our own capital and in the other capitals of the world these gentlemen of elegant leisure, who through the false pretense of representing nations tax the labor of mankind, have no more to do with the great movements of the world, its grand industries and its grand commerce and its grander hopes, than the gentle breezes have to do with the revolutions of the globe. When political questions actually arise, a man of affairs is in fact sent to attend to the business or the foreign offices attend to it direct.

Take the Central American states as an illustration of this idea. We had a few years ago ministers to all the little, petty governments of Central America, five in number. I do not think that my friend objected to the act abolishing all of them, or rather sending one minister to all. We sent a minister who was properly required to reside at Guatemala, if any where, and he settled down at the seat of government of that country, accredited to four other republics. Now let us see what is the nature of his services. Mr. Williamson, a very clever gentleman as I understand, in one of his "state-papers" addressed to Mr. Fish, says:

I have the honor to inform you that I took the liberty to accept the invitation of the British chargé d'affaires to be present at the firing of the salute to the British flag at San José de Guatemala, in accordance with the terms of settlement of the Magee question.

As the officials here are very sensitive, I took the precaution to ascertain from the minister of foreign affairs and prime minister whether my presence on the occasion would be altogether agreeable to the government of Guatemala. They assured me they would be pleased at my being present.

The salute was fired in the most formal manner, in the presence of the commanding general of the forces of Guatemala, General Solaris, and his staff, the British rear-admiral, Cochrane, and the officers of the part of his squadron—four ships—at San José, the British chargé d'affaires, and other distinguished persons, and myself.

There were also present, under arms, about two hundred troops of Guatemala, and a like number of marines and sailors from the British ships.

By the invitation of Admiral Cochrane, I had the honor of enjoying his hospitality on board of his flag-ship, the Repulse, while I was at the port.

At the official dinner given by the admiral on the Repulse, after the salute was fired, "The President of the United States" was one of the regular toasts, to which I responded.

I submit, there is one important omission in this dispatch. Mr. Williamson does not give us the substance even of that response. The speech is not given. There is a clear neglect of duty. Why, sir, one of your consuls, with two thousand dollars a year, is worth for the purposes of commerce all these fancy gentlemen put together whom we keep up in imitation of the feudal age at enormous cost to our Treasury.

Take any other. We have had a minister always at Chili, and this bill proposes to retain one there also accredited to Bolivia still. What are the valuable facts he communicates? I am taking up these despatches at random. Here is one dated February 12, 1875, addressed by Mr. Logan to Mr. Fish. He says:

Referring to the reception of the President's message, I have the pleasure to inform you that it gives universal satisfaction among the American residents of Chili, so far as I have been enabled to learn their sentiments.

The financial policy therein recommended, which in my own judgment is the only correct one, is particularly commended.

This is signed by C. A. Logan, and is dated from the "legation of the United States, Santiago de Chile."

Does my friend think that the people of this country can afford to pay $10,000 a year—the salary we pay this gentleman—to a gentleman to write four or five such "state-papers" as that in the progress of twelve months? I think not. These gentlemen are far above giving any attention to commercial matters. They are connected with courts and governments. They write dispatches.* Your consuls are the men who are connected with our industries, not these diplomatic gentlemen. Consuls are for use; these diplomats for ornament.

Mr. MONROE. If the gentleman will allow me, I beg to say that I think the sentiments of the President's message in regard to finance and currency are so sound that it pays well to have them promulgated and accepted in any part of the world. I wish they were as well accepted in the district of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not my friend know that he ought not to interpolate his finances into my remarks in that way? I am speaking of diplomacy. I am not objecting to Mr. Logan expressing his opinion, but what I do object to is our paying him $10,000 a year that he may have the leisure to do it. I object to paying $12,000 a year for a mission to Austria and Hungary if the only important message received is like one received recently from the predecessor of Mr. Orth, that His August Majesty of Austria had determined to visit Italy.

Our State Department could have learned that, if of any value, from any newspaper.

This whole thing of diplomacy is a sham now, and just as much obsolete and out of harmony with the age, and especially with our republican institutions, as any other obsolete institution which is still kept alive to enable some men to live off of the labor of others. It bears no relation to those grand missions in the early years of this Republic, of Franklin and his compeers, when a republic was demanding recognition of the nations. We are now far beyond that period in the world's history.

This bill proposes to consolidate for diplomatic purposes some of the governments of South America, if we must have some diplomacy. We have consolidated already without the slightest inconvenience or detriment to the public service the five little governments of Central America, as I have said, represented now by one diplomat, and he has apparently nothing to do. It is now proposed to unite Paraguay and Uruguay on the Atlantic side with the Argentine Confederation. We propose also to keep a sufficient number of consuls there. I wish my friend from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] to remember that we have a consul at every point on the Atlantic and Pacific and on the Caribbean Sea, in South America, where we have any commerce at all. We have a minister resident at Venezuela, for manifest reasons, and also at Brazil. It is Venezuela, Brazil, Chili, Peru, and the United States of Colombia which furnish the most commerce to us, and that is now inconsiderable, and the largest portion of the commerce of South America with the world.

Mr. MONROE. Does not this bill remove forty or fifty consuls?

Mr. HOLMAN. It does not fail to leave a consul at every port of South America and elsewhere which American vessels visit. We do abolish consulates where there is no business. We cannot afford to pay two or three thousand dollars a year at remote points where the fees are limited to two or three hundred dollars a year. We have not suppressed a single consulate where our people have any commercial business. Will my friend say that a consulate where the fees amount to two or three hundred dollars should be kept up at an expense of two or three thousand dollars? It is the consulates of that class which we propose to abolish. The President can still appoint the consuls and let them receive all the fees. There is no objection to that, and our law contemplates that policy.

We propose to unite Ecuador and the United States of Colombia and Peru together. Now does not my friend know, taking into account the extent of our diplomatic relations with these countries, that only one minister is really required for these three small republics? We have no political relations with them, only commercial. Sir, I am in favor of keeping up relations with these governments, but they must necessarily be commercial relations, and we provide a consul for every port on the Pacific in South America.

We unite Bolivia and Chili. Bolivia, as everybody knows, is substantially in the interior and Chili on the coast. We anticipate a minister at Peru, because there is no doubt that the President will designate the capital of Peru as the residence of the minister. In Chili and Bolivia we have consular representatives at every important point. My friend from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] will observe that we send more ministers to South America and other countries than they send us. Let us see how liberal we are about foreign appointments.

Bolivia sends us no minister; Ecuador does not; Greece does not—that land which so much excites my friend's sympathies; China does not; Liberia does not.

My friend from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] asks, Why keep up a minister-resident at Liberia and have none at Hayti? My answer is this, that the colony of Liberia upon the African coast was planted by us; that it is one of the offsprings of the humanity of our people; that it was established under the auspices of some of the best and purest men of the past age; that it has encountered serious obstacles; its inhabitants were natives of our country; and, if by any means a representative of the United States can render assistance to these remote people struggling to establish a republic in Africa, I say we should extend them all the aid in our power. We leave that mission untouched.

The gentleman says, Why withdraw the minister resident from Hayti? Why, for the simple fact that we need a commercial agent there and instead of the minister at $7,500 a year we provide a commercial agent at a salary of $2,000. My friend cannot deny that, looking at the question as a commercial one, that is the wiser and better policy. We have no political relations with Hayti.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that I have said all I desire to say on this subject. Instead of crippling we have sought to increase every facility for our commerce. It is commerce, not diplomacy, our Republic needs. Our diplomacy has not been the most creditable even in its way. Within a very few years, so recently that the blush is hardly yet off our cheeks, the minister to one of the second-class powers of Europe was permitted to come to the United States to engage in a controversy then going on between citizens of the United States and subjects of England. He came here still drawing the pay of a minister, as is alleged, at $1,000 a month, and he was allowed time under the law to travel from the court to which he was accredited to the capital of the United States and return and remain in this country for sixty days, with full salary. I have been told that this gentleman received large sums of money from persons who engaged him in England, taking advantage of his ministerial relations to interfere in private enterprises in which citizens of the United States were engaged.

Sir, I do not believe that is right; but he had nothing to do at the court to which he was accredited, and could be allowed three months' leave of absence, including travel, without loss of public service. It only illustrates what a useless bauble this diplomacy is.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to say that it is within my personal knowledge that the minister to whom he has referred received $100,000, and claims one hundred and twenty-five thousand more? I merely wish to confirm what the gentleman from Indiana said.

Mr. HOLMAN. We have a minister to South America who has not blushed to set up over our flag the emblems of a pawnbroker and made merchandise out of his ministerial office; but he had nothing else to do.

I admit with pleasure that there is one exception in the view I am compelled to take of our foreign representatives. There is a gentleman who left this Hall accredited our minister to France. He has rendered, if not to his own country, great services to humanity. In that fearful reign of terror in Paris, when France and Germany were in the death-struggle, he alone of all foreign representatives remained at the post of duty and threw the shield of diplomacy over the oppressed and miserable. Standing between conflicting armies, he rendered services to the cause of humanity. But this was but a fortunate incident, having no relation to the office of the diplomat.

We, a Government that has no entangling alliances, no political relations with the other nations of the globe, except treaties of amity and commerce, actually send abroad more ministers than come to our capital. We send abroad thirty-one ministers plenipotentiary and resident, and there are twenty-two foreign ministers who at times are here at this capital.

I believe that Switzerland, that model little republic, has never had a minister here. Why should she have? Why should we have one there? We have a consul at every important point in Switzerland. Switzerland is the most perfect of all models of republican institutions. With her government frugally administered, she cannot afford for mere show or pretense to tax her people by increasing offices. Switzerland has a president with a salary of $3,000—not one-half the sum we pay to the least salaried of these ministers—and every other official is paid upon the same frugal basis. We pay even our minister to Switzerland $7,500. Corruption in public affairs of course is there unknown. She sends no minister here, a mere empty pretext for expenditure; she does not tax her frugal, industrious people for the mere pretense of representation at foreign governments with which she has no political relations whatever. Thus we, in our anxiety to find pretenses for offices, send her a minister whom we never hear from, at a salary of $7,500 a year and contingencies.

I trust that this bill, this entering wedge of economy, this second attempt in earnest at retrenchment, will receive the cordial support of gentlemen on both sides of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD, I will yield five minutes to my colleague, [Mr. MONROE,] who desires to say a word or two in reference to some remarks made by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. MONROE. I wish to begin by saying that I have listened with great respect and interest, as I always do, to my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] in his remarks on this occasion. I should be very sorry in differing from him to say a word that could lead any one to suppose I did not fully appreciate the services which he has rendered to the country upon this floor. I recognize those services cheerfully.

I must say, however, that upon this question of the diplomatic service I think he does not reason with his usual soundness. I must be permitted to say that I think his method of arguing in favor of abolishing a large portion of our diplomatic and consular service abroad is precisely like what this method would be upon a proposition to abolish the Congress of the United States or greatly to diminish its numbers. If a gentleman advocating that proposition were to come into this House and take up the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for several years past, go over it and mark carefully all the passages which in his opinion did not exhibit very good sense or very sound logic in the debates which have taken place here, and then were to amuse this House, as he most certainly could do, by reading that for a great part of an hour to us—these selected passages, these choice morsels of English literature—in order to prove that we needed no House of Representatives, and it ought to be abolished—if a man were to pursue that course with the records of Congress, and then ask us to vote for a proposed amendment to the Constitution which would destroy the House of Representatives, abolish it entirely, he would give us a style of reasoning which would be an exact parallel to that of my friend from Indiana.

Why did not my friend read from the dispatches of Mr. Partridge, our minister to Brazil, who gave this nation a great deal of timely information in regard to the coffee trade of that country? Why did he not read from the dispatches of Mr. Andrews, our minister to Sweden, who has sent a great deal of valuable information to these United States? And I might name many others. Why was he so unfortunate in looking over the foreign correspondence as to come upon only those passages which I admit are very amusing and very entertaining, and which gave a sharp point to his speech, but which are less creditable to the service? Why could he not have found something of a different character? I think I should have no difficulty in selecting from the dispatches enough valuable matter to occupy the attention of this House for a long time.

But that is not the question; the question is not at all whether we have happened during the past few years to be represented abroad by a class of men of great attainments or ability for research, of great power to collect information or to anticipate coming political events or any events which might shift the currents of trade or affect prices, because all these things belong to the proper sphere of diplomatic representation abroad. The question is not whether we have had men of this high character, which undoubtedly is what we ought to have had. The question is whether there is such a thing as a proper place for diplomatic service abroad? Is there in the nature of things a call for such service? If there is, then, instead of attempting to destroy our diplomatic representation because the men who are in it do not come up to our ideal, let us struggle together to fill up by degrees as we can those places with men who shall reach our ideal. If we have not now the proper men in the Congress of the United States or in any Department of the Government, it is for the people as fast as they can to get the right men into the right places, and not to destroy great Departments of the Government and great and valuable branches of the public service, which have been established in the very nature of our national wants. It is for the people to improve and reform these branches of our service instead of trying to break them down and to destroy them.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] yield to me just a moment?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend [Mr. MONROE] must remember that these volumes are full of asterisks, indicating that what was deemed puerile had already been stricken out by the Department. What I have read is the real diplomacy!

My friend has said nothing about reduction of salaries. I presume he does not propose to say that our ministers to Great Britain, Russia, and the other powers shall continue to have $17,500 a year. I think he will consider the $14,000 proposed as far above what is a reasonable salary. But we must gradually get rid of this expensive bauble.

I wish to call the attention of the gentleman—I know my other friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] will not object—to an extract from a leading paper of his own State, from an article written by a gentleman of extensive foreign travel, who, as my friend is well aware, has had unusual opportunities of knowing what he writes about, a gentleman, too, of great fairness in his public utterances. It is as follows:

> More and more are the people becoming convinced that this costly bauble of diplomacy is of little value to our Republic. Let the present House of Representatives abolish the more useless missions, beginning with these South American ones, and a saving to the Treasury will be begun which may end in substituting consuls and business agents for these high-sounding "envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary," to the great benefit alike of the Treasury and of our public business abroad.

My friend will see that I have simply taken the idea put forward by this gentleman of large experience, rather than advanced any crude views of my own.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to detain the House long, nor to make anything like an elaborate argument on this bill; but I wish, if possible, to appeal to the judgment of the House as I would to a board of trade in an important business transaction. There is, I think, no bill on the whole list of appropriation bills more commercial in its character, more largely based upon business principles, than the bill which makes appropriations for our diplomatic and consular expenditures. There ought to be no party politics in such a bill. We ought to go to work upon it as though we were a board of railway directors making provision for the management of our road. And in what I shall say I hope there will not be found a tinge of partisanship.

I will say, in the outset, that I sympathize with the Committee on Appropriations in all their laudable efforts to cut down expenditures. I know how hard that task is. I know how much of local pressure is brought to bear upon them from all sides from interested parties who desire to swell appropriations, and I know, moreover, that every Executive Department tends to enlarge the field of expenditure within its jurisdiction, so that it is the business of that committee to resist pressure from all sides—pressure from the Administration, pressure from this House, and pressure from their friends outside who are always asking for more.

Now, I sympathize with the committee in their efforts at reform. I think there are several places where they can cut down very decidedly. Without stopping to indicate particulars, I will say generally that I think, for instance on the fortification bill, (though it is smaller the last year than ever before,) they can make a good deal of reduction, and ought to. In all that relates to public works, public buildings, rivers and harbors, whole establishments in the way of construction can be considerably reduced, and ought to be. I have no doubt, also, that many of our civil establishments here in Washington—which grew largely out of the war—greatly overgrown in consequence of the work which the war threw upon them, can be and ought to be still further reduced. I think there ought to be a reduction of ten or fifteen millions below the appropriations of last session. But I am not a little surprised, I must confess, to find the bill now before us in the shape reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

I believe every gentleman of intelligence on this floor will admit that the foreign service of the United States, the State Department, both as it is exhibited at home in its civil functions and abroad in its diplomatic and consular functions, has been for years the most economically conducted, the most honestly managed, the most carefully kept up of perhaps any of our Departments. All men of all parties have given their testimony in years past to that as the general truth. Now, when we remember that our diplomatic expenses, as reported in recent years, have been about a million and a third of dollars for all our complicated relations, consular and diplomatic, for a government of the size of ours, related in so many ways to the world, it seems to me on the whole a surprising thing that we have been able to keep it down to as low a figure as the annual bills of recent years show.

The bill proposes a reduction, I believe, of $435,000 on an aggregate of about $1,350,000. A little more than $174,000 of this reduction, as I understand, is proposed to be made in the diplomatic service by cutting off six ministers, by reducing salaries of the others, by reducing the contingent and other expenses relating to the diplomatic service. In the consular service the proposed reduction is about $260,000. The committee propose to abolish forty-four consulates and consular agencies and to make a reduction in contingent and other expenses connected with the consular service.

I will say but little in regard to the salaries of ministers abroad or to the general treatment in this bill of our foreign ministers. If gentlemen will examine the statutes as they stood prior to the act of 1855, they will find that our laws regulating the salaries of foreign ministers had stood unchanged from 1803 to 1855. Yet our ministers abroad of the highest grade were receiving in that period in some instances as high as $23,250 a year in salary and allowances, on account of the method then adopted of giving an outfit and an infit, and in consequence of their often remaining in service for a very short time. Under that system great evils grew up. A man would get his outfit, which was equivalent to one year's salary; he would stay at home six or eight months before starting for his post of duty, drawing pay from the date of accepting his commission; he would then go abroad and stay a few months, get his year's salary, together with an infit of $2,500, and come home. To show that I do not speak at random, I quote the following paragraph from a speech made by Mr. Mason, of Virginia, in the United States Senate, when the bill of 1855 was under discussion. The Senator says:

> Under the present system—I cannot call it the present law, there being very little legislation applicable to the subject—the actual allowance to a minister plenipotentiary to any of the courts for the first year of his mission is $23,250. The amounts, very briefly, which make up that sum are: Outfit $9,000, salary $9,000, infit $2,250, and the average of the overlapping salary $3,000, making $23,250 as the actual expenses to the Government in the case of a foreign minister who remains abroad one year. If he remains abroad two years upon a full mission, under the present system, the actual expense to the Government is $32,250 and the receipts of the minister $16,250. If he remains abroad four years, or one presidential term, the actual expense to the Government is $50,250 and the receipts of the minister are $12,562.

It was found that some of our representatives abroad were paid far too high, while the majority of those who served any great length of time were paid so small a salary that none but wealthy men could enter the service. And so, after a most elaborate debate, which gentlemen will find in the Globe for 1855, with full tables and exhibits showing the working of our consular and diplomatic system—information very instructive indeed—a discussion in which the giants of debate in both Houses took a part, it was found that the majority of our ministers who staid abroad any great length of time were wretchedly underpaid. Considering the cost of living abroad at that time, the salary of $17,500, without allowances, without outfit or infit, was given and fixed upon as a fair, reasonable compensation for first-class ministers. The bill passed in 1855, whigs and democrats alike joining in favor of it and agreeing to it as a wise measure.

Now, every man knows the cost of living throughout the world (and I have a table, which I will submit as a part of my remarks, showing from official statistics the increase in the cost of living in fifteen or twenty countries) has almost doubled in the last ten years, and more than doubled in many countries in the last twenty years. Yet, with the cost of living so vastly increased, with all the elements going to make up that cost so greatly increased, the Committee on Appropriations think they ought to cut down these salaries about 20 per cent. below the rates fixed twenty-one years ago. It occurs to me, Mr. Chairman, that they have departed from all just principles of business management in their judgment on that subject. I submit this suggestion without going into details.

Of course the result will be that these places can only be held by rich men. By the law of natural selection it brings wealthy men into our offices, and shuts out those who are unable out of their private fortune to live abroad and do duty for the Government. If that is so, if gentlemen desire to establish a plutocracy in this country, let us have it, but let us have it with our eyes open to its results.

I do not care much about some of the missions which it is proposed to abolish, and perhaps some of them can be abolished without much damage. But there is one class of missions whose abolition I should regret to see as a great calamity to this country. I speak of our missions to the South American States and Japan and China. There is no part of the world where the United States has so much right and so great duty to be chief in the councils of international powers as in South America on the one side, and Japan and China on the other. And yet our friends seem by a sort of fatuity to have seized upon those very countries as the places in which to limit and restrict our diplomatic relations. I do not believe they intended to do it. I must believe it was an accident, an oversight. Here are South American countries to which we are to send ministers to represent us at three or four republics apiece at a salary of $6,500 a year.

As an example of the effect of this bill, I submit a table showing the British diplomatic service in South America as contrasted with that of the United States by the present bill, from the British Blue Book of January 1, 1875:

BRITISH.		UNITED STATES.
Chili:		Chili and Bolivia	$6,500
Minister resident and consul-general	£2,000

It is proposed that we shall spend but $19,500 a year to keep up diplomatic relations with these countries of South America in which Great Britain is spending $59,500 for the same class of relations. We allow Great Britain, if this bill shall pass, to spend more than three times as much for the same kind of service to the same governments. Will we wonder, if this thing be done, that Great Britain gets the control of these countries away from us? Can any man be surprised hereafter, if we shall cut the cords which bind us to the South American republics and allow Great Britain to have three times as strong a hold on them, that the trade, the business, and interests of that great continent shall gravitate, not toward us, as they ought to, but toward Great Britain, as they will?

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman from Ohio tell us what effect the residence of a minister will have upon our commerce with those countries?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will speak of their commerce when I come to speak of the consular service. Of course the object of ministers to these countries is to keep up political relations; but the political headship of those countries is the power controlling all their commercial relations. We need at the headquarters of those South American States intelligent, cultivated American gentlemen to keep us informed of their political condition and necessities. We need our men there not only to inform us, but for the encouragement of these young republics. On every account let us keep up our relations with them. I would rather blot out five or six European missions than these to South America. They are our neighbors and republican friends. It is far more important to us to keep them up. I beseech gentlemen, therefore, to strike at some other than these South American Republics.

Let me now call your attention to our consular relations. This bill proposes to strike out forty consulates and to dispense with four commercial agencies, making in all forty-four. And the chief ground for this is that we do not get enough money back from these consular posts to make up the expense, and therefore we must cut them down so the pay shall equal the expense.

Now I hold in my hand, if gentlemen care to see it, and I will have it printed in my remarks, a statement as to some of the consulates cut off by this bill; and in order to show how Great Britain treats interests of this class, I have embraced in the table also a statement of how much Great Britain pays for consular service at the very consulates we propose to abolish.

List of certain consulates abolished by the bill, with memoranda as to British consulates at the same places, and fees received.

At twenty-one of these consular stations, which by this bill are abolished, and for which we have hitherto been paying $32,700, and by cutting off which we save $32,700, at those same ports Great Britain is paying $81,250 a year for consular officers to keep up her commercial relations; and at the same twenty-one consular ports Great Britain receives a total of only $6,210, while she pays $81,250 a year, not for the sake of the money she gets back now, but for the trade in the future, for keeping up commercial relations in pursuance of her far-reaching policy as a great commercial nation. And yet we to save $32,700 propose to abolish at a blow all those consulates and abandon the field to Great Britain.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the gentleman not understand what is the law about that—that wherever a consulate such as we have disposed of becomes in the least necessary, the law gives the consul-general the right to appoint what is known as a consular agent, who takes the fees? In no instance—and I defy the gentleman to show any such instance—where we have cut off these consulates have we in the least degree interfered with the commerce of the country.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think my friend would agree with me that it would be far wiser for us to keep that interest in our own control and not let it be delegated to a step-mother, under no special central directing control, like our present consular system.

But, Mr. Chairman, the general statement which I have just made is not sufficient. I want to apply it more closely to our consular relations with South America. Here is a table showing what it costs us in South America for all our consular service at the several countries. It costs us in South America $34,500. We get back from the same countries $36,942.83. I have given it here by countries and by aggregates. In other words, we receive from the whole of South America about $2,000 a year more than the service costs us. And yet in these very South American countries our friends have cut down almost as much as in any other part. Some of these consuls pay as much as they cost; some less, some more. But the balance-sheet for South America is in our favor. Shall we pick out some of the places that do not now pay in our present depressed condition, and blot out the consulates? If so, we abandon all hope of making them pay in the years to come.

I insert the following:

Memorandum of the relative cost of the consular service of the United States and Great Britain, and of the amount received by each for fees in several South American States.

[The amounts are taken from the United States State Department Register of October, 1874, and from the Foreign Office List of Great Britain of July, 1874. The fees of the United States consulates are those received for the year ending December 31, 1873. Those of Great Britain are stated to be those received in 1872-'73.]

SUMMARY.

The United States collected in fees from its own commerce	$36,942 83
And paid	34,500 00
Excess of fees	2,442 83
Great Britain paid for trade and commerce	£18,850 00
Collected in fees and commerce	4,657 00
Thus paying for the benefit of its trade, &c	14,193 00
Equivalent to	$69,070 23

From this table we see that Great Britain pays $91,733 at the same consular ports in South America where we pay $34,500; and she gets back only $22,663. She expends $60,070 a year more than she receives at these ports, while we spend less than we receive from them. And yet our friends propose to cut still deeper into our consular relations with South America, and leave the field to Great Britain. I cannot believe that when gentlemen reflect upon this from a business point of view they will persist in this course. Why, sir, the great business houses of New York will spend more money in proportion to their wealth in keeping up their commercial relations with South America and with the ports where they trade than the United States does. Intelligent selfishness would do more than is here proposed. Let us be as intelligent at least as the ordinary commercial traders of our cities.

Turn now to our relations with Japan and China. By the addition of Alaska to our domain we have established relations most important for our commercial future with those two great countries of Asia. I once said on this floor on another subject that it seemed to me just to say that at all eras of the world civilization has been grouped around some one sea as the focal center of its life and activity. Once the Mediterranean Sea was the center of the civilization of the world. The great empires that then governed mankind had their home and seat on its shores. After the lapse of centuries the human race turned away, leaving ruined empires in its track, and sought a broader theater than the Mediterranean, and the Atlantic became the great historical sea. And it is the great historical sea of to-day. But if there be anything in the lessons of history, the historical sea of the future is to be still grander; for the time may yet come when the center of civilization shall be shifted to the theater of the Pacific Ocean, and our Republic, holding the northern half of its eastern shore and reaching out an arm of islands a thousand miles to the northwest, ought to be the arbiter of that sea, the controller of its commerce, and the chief nation that inhabits its shores. For that reason we have extended commercial relations, have opened up close and intimate relations of commerce and amity with China and Japan. The old East has approached the new West; and we, the youngest born of time, have grasped hands with the most ancient nations of the world. We have sent ministers to China and Japan, we have sent out commercial agents and consuls to carry on the business with those countries, and to-day we send them half a million a week of coin dollars from our mint to be the trade-dollars of Asia. Now, what have our friends on the Appropriations Committee done in regard to our relations with the Japanese and Chinese governments? They have shorn us down to the smallest and narrowest proportions, such as will in effect drive us out of those countries as a power.

Let me state a few facts:

In Japan the United States pays consular, &c., salaries	$14,500 00
Received consular fees, (1873)	8,001 27
		$6,498 73
Pays diplomatic salaries		17,000 00
Total payments		23,498 73
Great Britain pays consular salaries	£13,457
Received no fees, (1873)
Pays diplomatic salaries	5,550
		£19,006
Equivalent to		$92,497 50
In China the United States pays consular salaries	$43,200 00
Received fees, (1873)	20,848 12
		22,351 88
Pays diplomatic salaries		17,000 00
Total payment		39,351 88
Great Britain pays consular salaries	£51,107
Received no fees, (1873)
Pays diplomatic salaries	7,600
		£58,707
Equivalent to		$285,697 61

From this it will be seen that England pays nearly half a million a year beyond all the receipts that come to her, and yet our friends on the Appropriation Committee think that we are far too extravagant. They can make a little fun at the expense of our ministers, then, by talking about their conversation in broken Chinese with the Celestials and seem to think that is enough to laugh out of Congress all our efforts to keep up our relations with that great nation of more than 500,000,000 people.

Gentlemen, I beg of you do not cripple and utterly ruin this young and growing commerce that shall bind Asia to the United States. Our friends on the Appropriation Committee seem to have adopted the rule that when they have any doubt about an appropriation to divide it by two, in the absence of any definite knowledge how the appropriations ought to be cut down. For example: the contingent expenses of our foreign and diplomatic service they have divided by two, making the amount $50,000 instead of $100,000 as heretofore voted. I hold in my hand a table compiled from the official records which shows the total contingent expenses of our foreign missions and foreign-intercourse service since 1853. This memorandum was prepared at the Department of State:

Prior to the year 1871 the appropriations for contingent expenses of foreign intercourse and for contingent expenses of missions abroad were distinct, a separate appropriation being made for each object.

The unexpended balances of former appropriations also remained to the credit of the appropriations and were not covered into the Treasury as now required by law.

The estimate submitted for the combined appropriation for contingent expenses of foreign intercourse proper and of all missions abroad (namely $100,000) is the lowest amount which can safely be counted upon as sufficient for the service. The expenditures under this head being "contingent" cannot be determined in advance with actual precision. Strict economy and care have been necessary to keep the amount within the appropriation of $100,000.

Expenses and the cost of everything have largely increased within the past twenty or thirty years.

The appropriations made by Congress for contingent expenses of foreign intercourse and of missions abroad for several fiscal years ending 30th of June in each year were as follows:

On the 30th of June, 1853, there were unexpended balances carried to the appropriations for the year ending 1854, as follows:

Contingent expenses of missions	$47,540 44
Contingent expenses of foreign intercourse	9,757 48
		$57,297 92
Amount of appropriations for four years, (1853 to 1857)		489,263 78
		546,561 70
Unexpended balances on June 30, 1857:
Contingent expenses of missions	$82,319 00
Contingent expenses of foreign intercourse	25,000 00
		107,319 00
Expended during four years, (1853 to 1857)		439,242 70
Average per year during Pierce's administration, (1853 to 1857)		109,810 67
Unexpended balance on June 30, 1857, (as above)		$107,319 00
Amount of appropriations for four years, (1857 to 1861)		415,000 00
		522,319 00
Unexpended balances June 30, 1861:
Contingent expenses of missions	$228 79
Contingent expenses of foreign intercourse	40,742 40
		40,971 19
Expended during years 1857 to 1861		481,347 81
Average per year during Buchanan's administration, (1857 to 1861)		120,336 95
Unexpended balance on June 30, 1861, (as above)		40,971 19
Amount of appropriation for four years, (1861 to 1865)		510,000 00
		550,971 19
Unexpended balances on June 30, 1865:
Contingent expenses of missions	$6,097 14
Contingent expenses of foreign intercourse	15,739 04
		21,836 18
Expended during the years 1861 to 1865		529,135 01
Average per year during Lincoln's administration, (1861 to 1865)		132,283 75
Unexpended balance on June 30, 1865 (as above)		21,836 18
Amount appropriated for four years, (1865 to 1869)		680,000 00
		701,836 18

Unexpended balance June 30, 1869:
Contingent expenses of missions	$8,186 78
Contingent expenses of foreign intercourse	130,722 61
		$138,909 39
Expended during the years 1865 to 1869		562,926 79
Average per year during Johnson's administration, (1865 to 1869)		140,731 69
Unexpended balance on June 30, 1869, (as above)		138,926 39
Amount of appropriations for four years, (1869 to 1873)		400,000 00
		538,926 39
Unexpended balance remaining in Treasury June 30, 1873		101,886 75
		437,039 64
Average per year during Grant's administration, (1869 to 1873)		109,759 91

From this it will be seen that during the last twenty-four years the average expenditure for the contingent expenses of foreign missions and foreign intercourse has been considerably more than $100,000. In no administration, except the first term of General Grant, have the appropriations been brought down to the average of $100,000 a year. Now, the average for the last forty years has not been as low as $100,000; yet the Committee on Appropriations, following their principle of dividing by two, have cut down this contingent item to $50,000.

Sir, it exceeded that amount fifty years ago, and has never been lower than that since the time of Thomas Jefferson. Now upon what principle have the committee acted? Is it simple division, to save labor, or what is it? You may ask the Secretary of State to furnish you the exact details of contingent expenses for any year for the last half century, and you will find that he will not be able to get it down so low as you have put it in this bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. May I interrupt the gentleman for a moment?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. SPRINGER. Does the gentleman say that the whole sum appropriated by this bill for contingent expenses is but $50,000?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do.

Mr. SPRINGER. For what purposes?

Mr. GARFIELD. For "contingent expenses of foreign intercourse and foreign missions."

Mr. SPRINGER. In another part of the bill there is appropriated the sum of $100,000 for "contingent expenses of the United States consulates."

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly; I am referring to our diplomatic service.

Mr. SPRINGER. Does not the gentleman know that these contingent expenses are continually being reduced from the fact that formerly a greater number of things were included under the head of "contingent expenses" than is the case at the present time?

Mr. GARFIELD. I am aware that of late years we have specified more than formerly. But this bill does not specify more than the bill of last year did, and the gentleman can derive no advantage in that regard.

I next call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the clause found in lines 271 and 272 of the bill, "for the relief and protection of American seamen in foreign countries, $60,000." Now, section 4577 of the Revised Statutes provides that—

> It shall be the duty of the consuls, vice-consuls, commercial agents, and vice commercial agents, from time to time to provide for seamen of the United States who may be found destitute within their districts, respectively, sufficient subsistence and passages to some port in the United States, in the most reasonable manner, at the expense of the United States, subject to such instructions as the Secretary of State shall give. The seamen shall, if able, be bound to do duty on board the vessels in which they may be transported according to their several abilities.

The consul cannot neglect this duty without violating the law. He must send the American sailor home; and he draws a draft, in the country where he resides, upon the Government of the United States for the expenses of sending that sailor home. Now, the experience of years shows that from $75,000 to $150,000 a year is employed in this way, and that we cannot get along with less. I remember that two years ago, I think it was, we had to make an extra appropriation of a large amount because of the wrecking of our whaling fleet by the ice in the Pacific. It went then far beyond anything we had expected.

Mr. SINGLETON. Will the gentleman allow me to have read a letter from the Comptroller on that very subject, which perhaps will give him some light?

Mr. GARFIELD. Let it be read after I get through. I do not want my line of argument broken in upon now.

Mr. SINGLETON. It is right in the line of the gentleman's argument, and will come in very appropriately at this point.

Mr. GARFIELD. I understand that very well; but let it be read at the close of my remarks. It will do just as much good then as now. I have here a table, furnished me by the State Department, showing how much has actually been expended for the relief of American seamen, with the amounts paid for transportation to the United States and loss by exchange, in each year since 1861, by which it will be seen that in no year has the amount been so small as that proposed by this bill for this purpose.

1862	.....	1869	79,714 89
1863	226,705 63	1870	90,078 61
1864	220,850 09	1871	71,064 10
1865	165,880 88	1872	191,216 86
1866	.....	1873	72,284 42
1867	151,282 81	1874	64,640 72

The amount expended for relief of seamen in 1872 at Honolulu, in consequence of the disasters to shipping in the Pacific in that year, was $121,855.42.

Average for fourteen years since 1861, $125,000.

Mr. RANDALL. Year before last it was only $39,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. RANDALL. I refer to the year 1874.

Mr. GARFIELD. For that very year it was over $63,000.

Mr. SINGLETON. I hope the gentleman will allow this letter to be read.

Mr GARFIELD. Not now.

Mr. RANDALL. If you want to get at the truth you will let it be read.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let it be read at the close of my remarks. Now, if you appropriate for this purpose only $60,000, this will be the result: When the $60,000 shall have been exhausted, drafts will be sent in from all parts of the world from which American seamen are sent home, and of course they will be dishonored, for there will be no money to pay them. There may be a hundred little drafts amounting in all to thirty or forty thousand dollars, from twenty different countries, sent by our consuls, and they will be dishonored simply because of this unnecessary effort to show a cutting down of expenses. There will be no more of this fund used than is called for under the strict letter of the law. Let us appropriate enough to cover what we understand to be the fair expectation of expenditures for this purpose. If it is not all used there will be no harm done. It is true the party will not have the credit of cutting down our expenditures by a few thousand dollars; but you will have saved American seamen from distress and also our Government from shame and protest. Let us do that.

I have only one other matter to refer to, I believe, and that is a very small one. It has been our custom for many years to appropriate a small fund with which to pay foreigners who by acts of gallantry save any of our citizens from shipwreck. Whenever some gallant English or French sailor has leaped into the sea and rescued an American seaman from death, our State Department has made him a small present, it may be a chronometer, a watch, a compass, or a medal, or $50 in money, with a letter of recognition of his gallantry. It has been found that during the last forty years about $5,000 a year has been used for these little testimonials. I believe it has averaged $4,766 for eight years and never has gone above $7,500. Now, if there is anything in the world which we ought to keep untouched, it is that little appropriation of $5,000 for that worthy purpose, to let men all over the world know that, if they take care of an American citizen or save his life, they will have this memorial of the thanks of the United States to carry with them. Now the committee comes to that estimate and, following their new rule, divide it by two, making it $2,500. Why should they higgle about a matter like this, which, though small in amount, is in its relations to the world and to our honor and our pride a great and important matter? I presume the provision of the bill on this point is an oversight; I do not think anybody would make such a reduction except as the result of oversight. Let it be corrected.

I have here a table carefully prepared in the Office of the Fifth Auditor, showing how much the great countries of the world, France, Russia, Great Britain, Spain, and the United States expend at the various consular ports where all these nations have consular offices. This table is very interesting, for it shows at a glance how valuable the consular service is supposed to be by these great powers of the world and how much we regard it as worth. It is a little mortifying to find that in every case the United States is away down at the foot of the list, even right at our very doors: in Cuba, in the islands of the Atlantic, and on the coasts of South America. So far as we can take the credit of economy while doing our work as well as they, let us glory in it; but I trust that this bill will not finally be put in such a shape that we shall be ashamed before the nations of the world for the way we treat our foreign and consular service. I close my remarks by appending the table; and when the bill is read by paragraphs, I will suggest some further amendments.

NOTE.—The United States salaries are computed at $5 to the £ sterling, and all the amounts are in £'s.

The United States salaried consuls are entitled, in addition to the salaries specified, to office rent actually paid not to exceed 20 per cent. of this salary, and for stationery, postage, &c., actually used at their consulates, but no allowance is made for office furniture except a chair and book-case.

GEORGE COWIE.

FIFTH AUDITOR'S OFFICE, February 2, 1876.

Remarks of British consuls upon difference in cost of living as compared with former periods.

Trieste.—Increase about one-third in all except rent.

Denmark.—From 1848 to 1868 increase in wages 25 per cent., meats 64 per cent., pork 52 per cent., butter 87 per cent.; house rent in greater proportion.

Nice.—Local and general taxation since annexation to France has augmented the cost of living to an unprecedented extent, and since the war with Germany still further increase.

Hamburg.—Rent 30 per cent., clerk hire 25 per cent., provisions 25 to 30 per cent. higher.

Leipsic.—Rents 75 to 100 per cent. higher; provisions 25 to 30 per cent.

Ancona.—Rents raised from £120 to £260; office from £22 to £44; provisions raise still greater.

Rome.—House rent 100 per cent. higher; living 33½ per cent. higher.

Havre.—Price of living increased; now higher than Paris.

Marseilles.—Increase from 20 to 25 per cent.

Palermo.—Price of living doubled and rents extremely high.

Oporto.—Rents 100 per cent. higher; meats from 100 to 150 per cent. higher.

Cadiz.—Rents and living 70 per cent. higher.

Smyrna.—Rent 30 per cent., prices of living since Crimean war at least 100 per cent. higher.

Jerusalem.—Rent 60 per cent. higher; vegetables, &c., 100 per cent. higher.

Cadiz.—Rents doubled; provisions higher.

Callao.—Everything from 40 to 50 per cent. higher.

Montevideo.—House rents from £122 to £3 6; wages 50 per cent. higher.

Valparaiso.—Rents and living much increased.

Mr. DUNNELL obtained the floor.

Mr. DURHAM. If the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] yields, I move that the committee rise.

Mr. DUNNELL. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. RANDALL. The effect of that will be to cut off some of the general debate. I think that the discussion might be continued a little longer this afternoon.

Mr. HALE. It is almost five o'clock.

Many MEMBERS. Let us adjourn.

Mr. DURHAM. I think it is time to adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. It is the desire of the Committee on Appropriations to pass this bill to-morrow. Gentlemen who do not want to stay and listen to the gentleman from Minnesota are not compelled to do so. I promise to stay; for I want to answer the objections the gentleman may make to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] is of course in order, and will be put unless the gentleman withdraws it.

Mr. DURHAM. I insist on the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOSKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. COCHRANE indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family; to Mr. ROSS, of Pennsylvania, for four days; to Mr. CABELL for one week, on account of illness in his family; and to Mr. LORD for one week, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. SAYLER, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Thomas Worthington; and

Mr. O'NEILL, papers relative to the Santillan land grant in California.

PAYMENT OF JUDGMENTS.

Mr. LORD. I ask unanimous consent that the House take from the Speaker's table, for the purpose of concurring in the Senate amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 1053) providing for the payment of judgments rendered under section 11, chapter 459, of the laws of the Forty-third Congress.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, and the amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

In line 4 of the bill, strike out "be" and insert "have been."

Amend the title by inserting before the words "the Forty-third Congress" the words "the first session of."

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated;

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. No. 31) granting a pension to Patrick Glackin;

A bill (H. R. No. 43) granting a pension to Elizabeth A. Neibling;

A bill (H. R. No. 104) granting a pension to Edward C. Wheelock;

A bill (H. R. No. 215) granting a pension to John G. Parr, of Kittanning, Pennsylvania;

A bill (H. R. No. 318) granting a pension to Annie Failey;

A bill (H. R. No. 556) granting a pension to Alexander St. Bernard, of Saint Clair County, Michigan;

A bill (H. R. No. 933) granting a pension to William D. Cobaugh;

A bill (H. R. No. 995) granting a pension to G. W. La Pointe;

A bill (H. R. No. 1044) granting a pension to Margaret E. West,

A bill (H. R. No. 1347) granting a pension to Hattie D. McKain;

A bill (H. R. No. 1596) granting a pension to Ruth Ellen Greelaud;

A bill (H. R. No. 1598) granting a pension to William R. Duncan;

A bill (H. R. No. 1599) granting a pension to Frances C. Elliott;

A bill (H. R. No. 1600) granting a pension to Jane A. Harris;

A bill (H. R. No. 1601) granting a pension to Otis B. Anderson; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1602) granting a pension to Margaret E. Cogburn.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 83) for the relief of James A. Hile, of Lewis County, Missouri—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (H. R. No. 193) for the relief of Ezra B. Barnett, postmaster at Norwich, New York—to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

A bill (H. R. No. 231) for the relief of Robert Erwin—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (H. R. No. 247) for the relief of James M. Coffinberry, of Cleveland, Ohio—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (H. R. No. 934) regulating the practice of United States circuit and district courts as to the time and manner of instructing juries and arguing the cause—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (H. R. No. 1595) for the relief of John T. Burchell, of Knoxville, Tennessee, for services rendered the Government in a small-pox hospital—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (H. R. No. 1803) to provide for the appointment of commissioners to take affidavits &c., for the courts of the United States—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 1802) making an appropriation to pay fourteen crippled and disabled Union soldiers from the 6th day of December, 1875, to the 30th day of June, 1876, was read twice by its title.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask that that bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What have those soldiers done?

Mr. SARGENT. I understand that they are extra to the ordinary roll of House employés, and have been paid in this manner from year to year. There is some peculiarity, some exceptional circumstance about this matter, and therefore I ask that the bill may be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not know but that they were those whose services had been dispensed with.

Mr. SARGENT. I understand that some of them have been dispensed with, and others of different politics have been put in instead. I do not know that that makes any difference in the justice of the claim in the mind of the Senator; it does not in mine. At the same time I would like to look into that and other circumstances.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

COURTS IN CALIFORNIA, OREGON, AND NEVADA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 53) fixing the time of holding the circuit court of the United States in the districts of California, Oregon, and Nevada.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was to strike out near the beginning of the second section the word "February" and insert "March;" so as to read, "that this act shall take effect on the 1st day of March, 1876."

The amendment was concurred in.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WITHERS presented the petition of Mary Hackley, praying that, as the legal representative of Robert J. Hackley, she may be allowed the preference right of purchase of one hundred and sixty acres of land, formerly located under the pre-emption laws of the United States by her husband in the State of Florida; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the petition of Frank G. Senseney and other heirs of Jacob Senseney, deceased, praying compensation for the use and occupation of certain buildings in Winchester, Virginia, by United States troops in 1864 and 1865; which, together with the papers already on file in the case, was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KELLY presented a petition of citizens of the State of Oregon and Territory of Idaho, praying Congress to establish a mail-route between Salubria, in Idaho, and Sparta, in Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. WINDOM presented a petition of 1,660 citizens of Minnesota and Wisconsin, praying for an appropriation to complete the Fox River improvement, and for the construction of a canal from Portage City, Wisconsin, to Prairie du Chien, Wisconsin, in accordance with the third plan recommended by General Warren; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented the petition of B. L. Cornish, praying pay as second lieutenant of Company D, Thirty-second regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, from November 11, 1864, to June 12, 1865; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ENGLISH presented the petition of John W. Bishop and 150 other citizens of New Haven, Connecticut, for the issue of fifty-year 3.65 gold-bearing bonds; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of A. S. Sutton and a large number of other citizens of the District of Columbia, remonstrating against the appointment and confirmation of certain police commissioners; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOWE. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, which I ask may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be reported if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF WISCONSIN, OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE,
Madison, February 3, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the Legislature of this State has adopted the following joint resolution No. 2:

"Whereas a bill was introduced in the United States Senate on the 10th day of January, 1876, by Senator Sargent, of California, entitled 'A bill to restore the lands conditionally granted, the conditions of which have lapsed, to the public domain,' which bill would include the grant of lands made to the State of Wisconsin by acts of Congress approved June 3, 1856, and May 5, 1864, to aid in the construction of a railroad from the Saint Croix River or lake, between townships 25 and 31, to the west end of Lake Superior and Bayfield;' and whereas forty miles of road have been built by the company to which has been given said grant by the State of Wisconsin, in consideration thereof, and said company is preparing and proceeding to build the remainder of said road, and the passage of said United States Senate bill would work great injustice to the State of Wisconsin, to said railroad company, and especially to that part of the State through which said road is to run:

"Resolved by the senate, (the assembly concurring,) That our Senators in Congress are instructed, and our Representatives therein requested, to oppose so much of said bill now pending in the United States Senate as will affect said grant of lands made to the State of Wisconsin.

"Approved February 1, 1876."

Very respectfully your obedient servant,

PETER DOYLE,
Secretary of State.

Hon. TIMOTHY O. HOWE,
Washington, District of Columbia.

Mr. HOWE. I ask if the Committee on Public Lands has reported the bill referred to in this joint resolution?

Mr. OGLESBY. What is the title of the bill?

Mr. HOWE. "A bill to restore the lands conditionally granted, the conditions of which have lapsed, to the public domain."

Mr. OGLESBY. No such bill has been reported from the Committee on Public Lands up to this time.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the resolution be printed and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented a resolution of the Vessel-Owners' and Captain's Association of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, against transferring the execution of the shipping-commissioners' act from the Department of Justice to the Treasury Department; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented several petitions of citizens of Philadelphia and other parts of Pennsylvania, manufacturers of and workers in iron and coal, praying that Congress aid in the construction of the Southern Pacific Railroad; which were referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented a communication from Hon. Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State, transmitting a communication from Sir Edward Thornton, British minister, in relation to the bestowal upon Hon. W. L. Scruggs, minister resident of the United States at Bogota, of a present as a recognition of valuable services to Her Majesty's government by the said United States minister in the arbitration and settlement of the claims of certain British subjects against the government of Colombia; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the petition of the western quarterly meeting of the religious society of Friends, of Chester County, Pennsylvania, and parts adjacent, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry into the results of the traffic in alcoholic liquors; which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 10) to secure depositors in the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company from ultimate loss, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 265) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase the building known as the Freedman's Savings-Bank, situated in the city of Jacksonville, to be used as a custom-house and post-office, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Henry M. Nagle, of California, praying to be refunded a sum equal to the amount of revenue-stamps affixed to manufactured brandy destroyed by fire before it could be sold, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. KELLY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 6) for the sale of timber lands in the States of California and Oregon and in the Territories of the United States, reported it without amendment.

JOHN A. TORRENCE.

Mr. McDONALD. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 269) for the relief of John A. Torrence, to report it without amendment and recommend its passage. I desire the present consideration of the bill, and send with it to the Chair to be read a letter of the First Comptroller of the Treasury showing the necessity for its passage. I ask that it be acted upon at once.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John A. Torrence, late receiver of public moneys at the land office at Harrison, Arkansas, the sum of $281.59; and to cause the further sum of $177.36 to be passed to his credit, in order to close his account as disbursing agent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter accompanying the bill will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE,
December 14, 1875.

SIR: Your account for the second full quarter of 1875 has been adjusted per report No. 26303, and there has been found to be due to you the sum of $458.95.

Your account as disbursing agent for the same period has also been adjusted per report No. 26202, and there has been found to be due from you the sum of $177.36.

This sum, $177.36, deducted from the amount, $458.95, due to you as receiver, would leave a balance due to you of $281.59, which sum cannot now be paid to you, for the reason that the $458.95 appears on the books of the Treasury as an overdeposit by you; and having been covered into the Treasury by warrant, can only be paid to you by act of Congress.

It is suggested, in the event you apply to Congress for relief, that the amount asked for should be $458.95, provided that $177.36 of the same shall be passed to your credit on your account as disbursing agent, in order to close the same; and the residue, $281 59, can be forwarded to you by a Treasury draft, thus closing your account on the books of the Treasury.

Very respectfully,

R. W. TAYLER,
Comptroller.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOUISVILLE BAPTIST ORPHANS' HOME.

Mr. KERNAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 259) for the benefit of the Louisville Baptist Orphans' Home, to report it without amendment, and if there be no objection I ask for its present consideration. If Senators desire, I will state its object.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides for the payment of $126, being the amount of two United States 5.20 coupons of $3 each, numbers 49699 and 316, due 1st of January, 1875, and also four Louisville and Portland Canal coupons, of $30 each, numbers 1398, 1399, 1400, and 1401, due 1st of January, 1875, belonging to the Louisville Baptist Orphans' Home, and which were inclosed in a letter and mailed by George W. Norton & Co., bankers in Louisville, Kentucky, to Messrs. Nolan, Slaughter & Co., New York, which letter was registered in the Louisville post-office on the 5th of January, 1875, and destroyed by fire at some point between Baltimore and Washington, on the 7th of January, 1875. But the Secretary of the Treasury is to take from the claimant before payment a bond, with good security, for the protection of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. McMILLAN, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 413) establishing the port of Saint Paul, Minnesota, as a port of appraisal; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WINDOM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 414) establishing the port of Du Luth, Minnesota, as a port of appraisal; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 415) to provide an exchange of laws and reports with the several States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Daniel Miller be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF SAINT ALBANS.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 58, reported from the Committee on Claims. It will take but a very few moments. It is a bill which passed the committee last session, and also this session, unanimously.

Mr. CLAYTON. Does the Senator think that bill will elicit any discussion?

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not think it will.

Mr. CLAYTON. Was it before the Senate at the last session of Congress?

Mr. WRIGHT. It was before the Senate at the last session of Congress. It elicited no discussion then, as I remember. It did not pass for want of time. It is reported unanimously by the committee. I understand the position of the Senator, and I do not want to antagonize his bill, but I shall be very glad to get this bill disposed of.

Mr. CLAYTON. If it leads to no debate, I have no objection.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move to take up the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill (S. No. 58) to pay the First National Bank of Saint Albans, in the county of Franklin and State of Vermont, the value of certain United States Treasury notes held by said bank as financial agent of the United States, and forcibly taken therefrom by raiders from Canada in October, 1864.

An amendment was reported by the Committee on Claims, to strike out in lines 10, 11, and 12, the words: "With interest thereon from the 19th day of October, 1864, to the time of such payment."

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the report read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, on the 26th of January:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 58) to pay the First National Bank of Saint Albans, in the county of Franklin and State of Vermont, the value of certain United States Treasury notes held by said bank as financial agent of the United States, and forcibly taken therefrom by raiders from Canada, in October, 1864, having considered the same, submit the following report:

On the 19th day of October, 1864, the Saint Albans raid occurred. On that day, at a little after three o'clock p. m., parties of from three to five persons entered the three village banks in that village. They were armed with large Navy revolvers concealed under their coats. They had belts and traveling-bags, or haversacks. In two of the banks a cashier and teller were present; in the other, only the cashier.

The raiders said they were confederate soldiers; had come to rob the banks and fire the village, and presenting their pistols at the bank officers threatened them with instant death if any resistance was made or alarm given. Thus securing the persons of the bank officers, they proceeded to rob the banks.

While these parties were thus engaged in the banks their associates on the outside were gathering horses from the hotels and livery stables in order to mount and ride for Canada. In this they met with considerable resistance. They fired their pistols at persons passing in the streets, and shot a Mr. Morrison fatally, and seriously wounded a Mr. Huntington. They attempted to set fire to a hotel and some other buildings with "Greek fire."

The banks were soon plundered, the horses got together and saddled and bridled, and within thirty minutes from the time the banks were entered the whole party of raiders were galloping for Canada. They arrived at Frelighsburgh, a little village in Canada, about a mile and a half north of the boundery line, about six o'clock in the evening, and within three hours after the time they began their outrage.

The moment the raiders reached Frelighsburgh they dispersed, each one seeking to save himself and his booty and to find friends and shelter.

The citizens of Saint Albans, recovering from the surprise of such an unexpected attack, immediately got what few fire-arms could be found, and a party of about twenty, under Captain Conger, followed the raiders in hot pursuit, and arrived at Frelighsburgh soon after them, probably by half past six o'clock p. m.

Soon after Captain Conger's party had left Saint Albans, another party of citizens went in pursuit of the raiders, taking another road for the purpose of cutting them off, and arrived at Frelighsburgh very early on the morning of the 20th of October. The party of Americans at Frelighsburgh, numbering only from twenty to twenty-five on the evening of the 19th, had increased to forty or fifty early on the morning of the 20th. Judge Hoyt, one of the directors of the First National Bank, and Mr. Clark and Mr. Burton, two of the directors of the Franklin County Bank, were of the number. It was chiefly due to the activity and energy of the party of Americans that ten of the raiders were arrested on the night of the 19th and the morning of the 20th of October, and secured by the Canadian authorities, and that $74,000 of the stolen money was recovered within twelve or fourteen hours after their arrival at Frelighsburgh.

On the 24th of October, proceedings were commenced before Judge Coursol for the extradition of the fourteen raiders then in custody. Various proceedings and delays took place. Finally, on the 13th of December, Judge Coursol decided that he had no jurisdiction of the case, and set the prisoners free.

This decision of Judge Coursol was disapproved by the Canadian authorities, and Sir George Cartier ordered the re-arrest of the raiders, to be tried before another judge, and offered a reward of $200 for the apprehension of each of the escaped prisoners. Nine of the prisoners escaped; five were re-arrested.

The five raiders re-arrested were tried before Judge Smith. He held that they were belligerents, duly commissioned by the confederate authorities and acting under the immediate orders of C. C. Clay, jr., confederate agent; that their acts were not robbery and murder, but belligerent acts; and, therefore, that they could not be delivered up under the extradition treaty; and he discharged them.

June 22, 1864, the First National Bank of Saint Albans was designated a depository and financial agent of the United States, and was authorized to receive subscriptions for bonds and Treasury notes of the United States. The bank did receive, in September and the early part of October, subscriptions to the amount of $35,000 for three-years coupon Treasury notes, bearing 7.3 per cent. interest, issued under the act of June 30, 1864. The money on these subscriptions was paid into the bank and placed to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States; report thereof was made to him, the Treasury notes were ordered for the subscribers, and, October 15, 1864, were received to the amount of $35,000. The bank immediately notified the subscribers, and by the 19th they had delivered $6,350 of them to subscribers residing in Saint Albans and vicinity. The remaining notes, $28,650, being the subscriptions of thirty persons, were seized and carried off by the raiders, together with large amounts of money and other property in the safes of the bank. The thirty subscribers demanded the delivery of the notes or the return of the money to them.

The officers of the bank immediately after the raid notified the State and Treasury Departments of the United States of everything that had transpired in connection with said raid. They furnished said Departments at once with all the denominations of said Treasury notes which had been seized, with a request that said Department would caveat said Treasury notes on the books of the Department, which was done.

The bank also issued a circular containing numbers and stating that said Treasury notes had been caveated, and warning all persons from taking or negotiating the same. This was sent to every bank and banker in the United States, so far as possible, and published in the city papers. These Treasury notes were payable in blank, no payee named.

Notwithstanding all this, the Treasury Department paid or converted the same in the condition they were in when seized, without any payee named in the same, and the bank had no notice thereof until after they were paid or converted, and was deprived thereby of showing that said Treasury notes were presented by or on behalf of parties having guilty knowledge that the same were seized unlawfully from the bank, and that the title to the same was in the United States.

This course may have been a prudent course for the Government to pursue at the time, to give negotiability to its securities; but it should not have been done to the prejudice of the petitioner without at the same time recognizing its right to indemnity.

The bank having been importuned for payment for more than a year by said subscribers, to relieve itself from embarrassment and injury arising from clamor and threatened litigation, gave to the subscribers the amount of their several subscriptions, under protest, in order to save the credit of the bank, believing that the Government would fully re-imburse it.

It appears from the affidavits submitted to your committee that the bank followed substantially the instructions and customs of the Department in transacting the business.

The case, therefore, squarely presents the question whether "a designated depository and financial agent of the Government," authorized and "required" to receive and disburse public moneys, to redeem currency, to receive subscriptions for Government securities, and to hold and deliver the same to subscribers, under the orders and directions of the Secretary of the Treasury, and while in the exercise of such duties and obligations such moneys and notes—the property of the Government—are forcibly seized by an overpowering force of the enemies of the said Government, without the fault or neglect of said officer or agent, being a loyal citizen of such Government, is entitled to relief.

Your committee are of the opinion that it can hardly admit of a doubt.

As a principle of law, it cannot be denied that "an officer" or agent of the Government is only bound to exercise "a degree of care and diligence as the custodian of public moneys, or securities, which a careful, prudent man would require of his agent in a matter of private interest or exercise in his own affairs," and is only liable for negligence or fraud. The rule as laid down in the case of The United States vs. Thomas (15 Wallace, 337) is as follows, namely: "A collector or receiver of public money, under bond to keep it safely and pay it when required, is not bound to render the money at all events, but is excused if prevented from rendering it by the act of God or the public enemies, without any neglect or fault on his part."

The court holds in the same case that "the late rebellion, being a public war, the forcible seizure by the rebel authorities of public moneys in the hands of loyal Government agents, against their will and without their fault or negligence, was a sufficient discharge from their obligations in reference to said moneys."

These legal principles have been fully recognized and adopted by Congress. The cases are numerous and decisive upon this point. See the following:

Act to relieve D. O. Cleveland, postmaster, Laws 1873, page 722.

Act to relieve A. A. Vance, postmaster, Laws 1871, page 699.

This is also the case with larceny from paymasters of the United States Army and Navy in numerous cases.

Act to relieve John S. Cunningham, paymaster United States Navy, Laws 1868, page 358.

The rule has also been extended to mail-contractors for horses captured by rebel forces and guerrillas during the war.

See joint resolution to pay John R. Berkley, Laws 1867, page 644.

Congress paid Thomas C. Magruder money stolen from him belonging to the Government, after the same had been refunded by him to the Government. Laws of 1873, page 762.

Your committee are satisfied that this bank, at the time of the raid, and from June 22, 1864, was a duly-authorized agent of the Government; that, without any fault or negligence, while acting as such agent, it sustained this loss, and that its claim for this amount, $28,650, is just, and ought to be paid. We strike out of the bill the clause directing the payment of "interest thereon from the 19th day of October, 1864," and recommend the passage of the bill as amended.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I would rather that bill should go over until to-morrow, so that I may have an opportunity to examine it. At present, I am very clear in the opinion that there is no case at all against the United States; but I should like to look at the statute which defines the duties and obligations of these banks, who, for their own profit, undertook to sell bonds of the United States. These bonds were sold by the United States, sold by this bank for the United States, and the bonds were delivered. Now it seems to me that to make the Government responsible for the safe custody of these bonds by the bank would not be fair.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am very certain that my friend as chairman of the Committee on Finance, if he will cast back his memory, will remember that we have passed one or two bills precisely of this character, and I think they were passed through the Finance Committee when I was a member of it. I am not certain as to that, but I think the fact is so.

Mr. SHERMAN. The report has been read, and I will look at the law if the Senator will let the bill go over until to-morrow.

Mr. WRIGHT. With the understanding that I shall have consent to take this bill up to-morrow morning immediately after we dispose of the morning business, I will consent to let it pass over now. I understand I have unanimous consent for that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be postponed till to-morrow, no objection being made to that disposition of it.

Mr. CLAYTON obtained the floor.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will ask the indulgence of the Senate to say that while ever ready to do his part of official labor, he finds that service upon three committees and the requirements of the Chair are incompatible. To do justice to the Chair and meet the expectations of the Senate, it is impracticable to answer the frequent sessions of the Committee on Finance and perform other committee labors. He therefore asks to be relieved from service on the Committee on Finance. Will the Senate excuse the Senator from Michigan in the chair from further service on the Committee on Finance?

The question being put, Mr. FERRY was excused.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. How shall the vacancy be filled?

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Chair fill the vacancy.

The motion was agreed to unanimously; and

The PRESIDENT pro tempore subsequently appointed Mr. COOPER.

PUBLIC LANDS IN SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move that we resume the consideration of Senate bill No. 2.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 2) to repeal section 2303 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, making restrictions in the disposition of the public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. EDMUNDS to insert the following proviso at the end of the bill:

And provided, That the public lands affected by this act shall not be open to private entry until the same shall be offered at public sale after the passage of this act.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, on reflection I am inclined to accept the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, somewhat modified, however, in a manner which I think he will himself agree to. I send to the Clerk's desk an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendment; which was to strike out all the words after "provided," and insert:

That the public lands affected by this act shall be offered at public sale as soon as practicable, from time to time and according to the provisions of existing laws, and shall not be subject to private entry until they are so offered.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, this amounts to about the same thing as the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. The objection I have to his amendment is, that it does not require these lands to be offered at public sale. It says they shall not be subject to private entry until they are offered at public sale; but there is no law now which requires lands to be offered twice; and in view of the fact that his amendment does not require these lands to be offered at public sale with a provision covering that point that they shall be offered from time to time under the provisions of existing law, I think I can accept his amendment. In doing so, however, I want to say that I am clearly of opinion myself that the result will prove, after the sales are had, when the expenses of conducting those sales, of advertising in the newspapers this immense amount of lands to be offered, are taken from the products of the sales, that the Government will realize less than a dollar and a quarter an acre for them. I think you will find that the whole system of offering lands at public sale generally results in the Government getting but a dollar and a quarter an acre for those lands. But in view of the fact that there seems to be an impression here that these lands are valuable, and in view of the apparent propriety of these lands, if valuable, being subjected to public competition, I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment. It will delay somewhat the bringing of the lands into market, but will eventually accomplish my purpose.

Mr. ALCORN. Mr. President, as I remarked when I had the honor to address the Senate a few days ago on this subject, the people of the State of Mississippi feel no interest whatever in the passage of this bill, either one way or the other. A feeling came upon me when the question of the repeal of the present law was presented, of injustice to the people of the State of Mississippi that they should be made an exception with regard to the public lands that lay within their dominions.

I am opposed to this amendment which is accepted by the Senator from Arkansas; and the grounds upon which I base my objection are entirely those which appertain to the public. I repeat my constituents feel no interest in the world in the passage of this bill; but the public has an interest, and that interest I now venture to undertake to protect.

Are there Senators here who know anything of the operations of the sales of public lands by the Government of the United States? The long experience that we have had in Mississippi on that subject—and I have lived long enough to speak from the book in what I say here—is that in no instance where the public lands have been offered at public sale have they been to any considerable extent sold for any more than the minimum price. There are four millions of acres of woodland now in Mississippi. I have stated to the Senate that these lands were offered fo a long period of time at a dollar and a quarter an acre; that in the flush times of the South, when land was worth five or six hundred per cent. more than it is to-day, they were not sold; that they were graduated down to twelve and a half cents an acre, and still there were no purchasers. I have stated the fact, which the public records show, that, of the lands heretofore purchased of the United States at a minimum price of not less than a dollar and a quarter per acre, Mississippi to-day owns two million acres that have been forfeited for the taxes, forfeited for a number of years, forfeited from the time when the war closed; that quite recently the State of Mississippi, in order to induce those whose lands had been forfeited to come and pay the taxes, by an act of the Legislature agreed that the former taxes should be abated, together with the costs, upon all lands held by the State that might be paid upon in the year 1874. The proposition was, "Come and pay your taxes for the year 1874 and all the arrears of taxes shall be abated." The fact is further shown by the record that not 2 per cent. of the lands that had before that time been forfeited were redeemed under this proposition.

Now, if you pass this bill with the proposed amendment what will be the result? The receipts will be swallowed up by the expensive operation: the formula of offering these lands for sale; lands that have been in the market for fifty years; lands that have been offered at twelve and a half cents an acre; lands in a State where to be the owner of land is to have an incumbrance upon your shoulders, land-loving people though they are. Things have got to such a pass that to-day the people of the State of Mississippi have forfeited their lands to the extent of 2,000,000 of acres in the richest portion of Mississippi, in that alluvial district that produces a bale of cotton to the acre. I shall be pardoned for speaking of that which I know, of that which appertains to myself, when I say that I have permitted to be sold for taxes lands that were purchased by me twenty years ago at from five to ten dollars an acre, and that I have refused to avail myself of the opportunity, in 1874, of purchasing those lands for the taxes of that year. Why? Because of the fact that I knew the taxes would be continued from that time forward; and the same reasons which induced me to leave those lands go to the State were the reasons that impelled me to refuse the proposition that was made.

There is only one way in the world in which the Government can be benefited or anybody benefited in Mississippi by the disposition of these lands. As I said the other day, there are some timber lands on the waters of the Pearl River near the sea-coast, where the milling interests, the lumber interests, have grown up since the war. The lands there are being denuded of their timber; the Government lands are being despoiled. Under the operation of your homestead law, strangers come there from abroad, for these mills are not owned and not worked, as a general thing, by the people of Mississippi—those I mean of the class of people who lived in Mississippi before the war, but they are enterprising men, sir, from your own State—enterprising men from the North. These enterprising men have come there and they succeed in obtaining a homestead of forty acres under the operation of the homestead law as it now exists, and this is about the only way in which any of the lands have been disposed of. They obtain a forty-acre tract under the homestead law, and upon this license they go and cut the timber off hundreds of acres of the public lands, cut wherever they choose. They have a claim upon the forest, and this claim they assert in the form of ax-men that go there and cut it down by the hundred acres.

If the bill were passed in the form that it was introduced by the Senator from Arkansas in the first place, the result would be that these men would go and enter the land at a dollar and a quarter an acre. They would pay that for it; but if you put it up at public auction what will be the result? The expense of the sale will attach to the Government; these men will form combinations, and not one acre will sell for more than the minimum price. I do not believe, in truth, that under the bill as it now stands 10,000 acres of this land will be entered in the State that I represent. I am sure that, if it passes with the amendment that is now proposed, the result will be a tax upon the Government, a tax on the Government whereby the expenses of the offer of the land at sale will largely exceed in money what may be derived from that sale. I am indifferent, I repeat, so far as my own constituents are concerned; but I feel it my duty to speak for my own State here, in behalf of the public welfare, which will not be an advance by this amendment, but will be retarded. The Government will be mulcted in heavy costs. The report of the Land Commissioner will show, I venture the assertion, two years from this time that thousands of dollars have been paid in the State of Mississippi to discharge the expenses of offering this land for sale, whereas the sales themselves will not pay more than one-half the cost.

Now, having said this much, Mr. President, I shall say no more. I shall vote for the bill.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. President, I have said nothing in the debate on this bill so far, and, indeed, I had expected not to say anything; and I shall say but little now. The bill was referred to our committee, and was fairly considered in committee, and a majority of the committee recommended its passage. It is perhaps due from me, considering my relation to that committee, that I should state here that I am opposed to the passage of the bill, and am still opposed to it, and shall vote against it. It is a question of some magnitude; and gentlemen more immediately and locally interested in it than those of us whose States are not to be affected by the bill, feel a very considerable anxiety that the bill shall pass at an early day. I have been opposed to the bill for a few reasons, which I will briefly state, and then let it take its course.

It is said that these are chiefly barren pine lands, and that they will not be taken for homestead settlement; that since the close of the war but a small portion of the public lands in these States has been taken for actual settlement; and since they are chiefly barren pine lands, and will not probably be taken for homesteads, the argument is that it will be better to put them in the market at the minimum price of a dollar and a quarter an acre, and thus get that much revenue from them for the Government. Of course, Mr. President, I am not acquainted with these lands to any very considerable extent; but I have supposed, and do still suppose, that in many localities, even in the region of the barren pine-timber lands, places will be found where patches of a few acres together, three, four, five, ten, fifteen, or twenty acres, may be cultivated, where a colored man or a poor white man may go and make a home, erect a cabin, and make a settling-place. Having done that he may cultivate to the extent of the cultivable land whether less or more, and take with that little patch enough of adjoining timber land to make up one hundred and sixty acres. Where there are colored people or white people disposed to make homesteads on such tracts as would afford these advantages, they may find small parcels of agricultural land and add enough timbered land to get one hundred and sixty acres. I have thought it would be easier to reserve these lands still for that purpose. If they were so located they would take great care of the timber, they would preserve the timber, and would have for themselves a humble home, a secure home. When that period shall come that the freedman, the American citizen now, feels at liberty to move away from where multitudes are collected out of considerations of personal safety; when good order shall come, when the day of better feeling shall arrive and these men shall feel that they can leave the communities where they are and go off with perfect security and make settlements elsewhere and be safe, I have supposed that they would do so, and would largely occupy these lands and make homes upon them.

These have been chiefly the considerations that have controlled me in my conclusion to oppose this bill. It is true there is very much in what the Senator from Arkansas says, and very much in what the Senator from Mississippi says, which goes to show that these lands will not be occupied by settlers or by pre-emptors, or by purchasers. Indeed the account given of the public lands in Mississippi by the honorable Senator from the State is most discouraging. I am almost amazed that that people, whom he characterizes as once a land-loving people, have in recent years lost attachment and fondness for real estate; but the time must come, and the time will come, when all the public lands of this country will be sought by men desirous of making homesteads and actual settlement upon them. It will come as sure as the country lasts. Do you not know, Mr. President, and does not this country already know, that the public lands fit for cultivation are fast disappearing from the public? Do we not know that in a short time, less than a quarter of a century, it will be an impossibility to find a section of unoccupied land for the actual settler, so rapidly is it disappearing in a thousand different channels?

Now, in conclusion, and not to take the time of the Senate, I wish to say that this measure, which seems to be so near the feelings of the Senators from the Southern States, because it removes a law that they think operates unjustly against them in the nature of a discrimination against their people, ought not to be pressed now. I wish to say to them and to the Senate that this very question of the timber lands of this country is under consideration by the Committee on Public Lands, and the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate has taken one step toward settling a policy or beginning a policy with reference to these timber lands. In that condition of affairs I think it better to let the lands in these five States remain as they are at present, subject alone to homestead settlement.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I should like to submit a second section to this bill before it passes from our consideration to-day, and I give notice that I will offer it as an amendment and ask that it be printed.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

SEC. 2. That before any timber lands of the United States shall be offered for sale an appraisal shall be made of the sections to be offered in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe, and such appraisal shall be the minimum price at which such sections shall be sold: Provided, That sales shall not be made at less than $1.25 per acre.

The proposed amendment was ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President——

Mr. MORTON. I wish to offer a resolution.

Mr. WRIGHT. To ask for its present consideration?

Mr. MORTON. If there is no objection to it.

Mr. WRIGHT. I yield for that purpose.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA GOVERNMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from Indiana will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to consider the propriety of preparing and reporting a bill to provide a government for the District of Columbia, under which the people, through the elective franchise, may regulate and control their domestic affairs, not inconsistent with the protection, regulation, and control by the United States of public property and the exercise of such jurisdiction as may be necessary in the national capital.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent.

Mr. MERRIMON. We have already passed a resolution like that, but I do not object.

Mr. MORTON. It is not like this.

The resolution was agreed to.

C. H. FREDERICK.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask leave to make a report at this time, not having been in my seat when reports were called for. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Lieutenant-Colonel C. H. Frederick, Ninth Missouri Volunteer Infantry, praying compensation for two months and four days' services, commutation, &c., rendered by him during the war, have instructed me to report a bill.

The bill (S. No. 416) for the relief of C. H. Frederick, late a lieutenant-colonel in the Ninth Missouri Infantry, was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask that the bill just reported by the Senator from Illinois from the Military Committee be put on its passage. It has passed before and failed in the other House for want of time.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not want to antagonize the Senator, but I must object. I want an executive session.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think it will take but a single moment to dispose of the bill. It involves only a few hundred dollars.

Mr. WRIGHT. I cannot yield. I insist on my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. One moment for a word of explanation. Yesterday I gave notice that to-day at one o'clock I should ask the Senate to take up for consideration the centennial bill. I desire to make one single remark in that connection. Whatever measure the Senate passes on that subject ought to be passed at the present time. The financial condition of the company is such that one ought not to delay; whatever our pleasure may be upon that subject ought to be expressed. If we intend to turn our back upon it, very well. If we feel under obligations of any sort in regard to it, they ought to be expressed. I have no disposition now to interfere with what seems to be the pleasure of the Senate to go into executive session; but I desire to repeat that at the earliest moment I shall urge this bill on the consideration of the Senate, and trust there will be a disposition to dispose of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I respectfully submit that when we adjourned last night on the unfinished business I had the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But the Senator from Iowa has moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, pending which he yielded to the Senator from Maine who is holding the floor by the sufferance of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I had the impression that when a Senator desiring to speak on a subject rose and got the floor, and the Senate then adjourned or went to the consideration of executive business, when the unfinished business next came up that Senator was entitled to the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator insists, the Chair will so rule.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not insist on anything; I only make the statement.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Then I hope my honorable friend will allow me to make a motion to take up the centennial bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday, being the resolution in relation to the admission of Mr. Pinchback as Senator from Louisiana, is before the Senate; and on that resolution the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I wish to say, the unfinished business being before the Senate, that I think we ought to go on with this centennial bill; but we ought to act intelligently. We directed the Secretary of State some days ago to inform us touching the correspondence with other governments respecting the invitations, &c., to this affair. We have not yet received his reply. You will notice that the preamble of this bill—if I may refer to the merits of it—sets forth as one ground for its passage that our honor is committed to foreign governments upon the subjects. This information, of course, would be of great importance touching that question. I had reason to suppose that that information would be furnished to us yesterday; I have no doubt it will come to-day; but I think we ought to wait a reasonable time so that we may act with all the facts before us and in such a way as that our action will justify itself to the people of the United States. Having said that I yield to the Senator from Iowa for the purpose of making his motion.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EATON. I hope the Senate will not go into executive session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The question is not debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Vermont has forgotten, probably, that this day was set apart for a particular purpose. The Senator from Connecticut is only seeking to remind the Senate of that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to hearing the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not object.

Mr. EATON. I will simply say that to-day was set apart for the purpose of offering resolutions regarding my late colleague, Mr. Ferry. I should dislike to see the Senate go into executive session and thus have the day lost to that purpose.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand my friend does not propose to offer these resolutions until 3 o'clock. We can open the doors and get back into regular session by 3 o'clock.

Mr. EATON. I would rather offer them now than run the risk of losing the day. My colleague [Mr. ENGLISH] is compelled to be absent after to-day.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am certain we shall be in executive session but a short time. There is no disposition at all to interfere with the matter the Senator from Connecticut has in charge. I trust we shall have an executive session. I insist on the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 14——

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. My colleague [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] is paired to-day and is necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 43; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Bruce, Dorsey, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Howe, Logan, McCreery, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Sargent, Sherman, West, and Wright—18

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Booth, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton, Clayton, Cockrell, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Eaton, English, Ferry, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McDonald, Maxey, Merrimon, Norwood, Paddock, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, Wallace, Whyte, Windom, and Withers—43.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bogy, Burnside, Christiancy, Conover, Cragin, Gordon, Harvey, Jones of Nevada, Morrill of Maine, Oglesby, and Spencer—11.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is before the Senate, on which the Senator from Vermont is entitled to the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Maine appeals to me to yield to him to make a motion. I do not think we ought to consider that bill until we get the information to which I have referred, which I hope every moment will be here; but as the Senator from Maine has charge of the appropriations, and we have been accustomed to yield to that committee at its command, I shall not because of the fact of my being entitled to the floor at this moment stand in the way of his making any motion that he thinks he ought to make under the circumstances. I therefore yield the floor.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I now move that this business be laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the centennial appropriation bill.

Mr. MORTON. I do not object to taking up the centennial bill, but I desire to say that as soon as that bill is disposed of I shall urge the Senate to resume and proceed with the consideration of the unfinished business of to-day, and I shall ask the Senate to remain until the vote is taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 514) relating to the centennial celebration of American Independence.

Mr. MORTON. I hope the Senate understands me. When the consideration of the Pinchback case is again resumed, I shall ask the Senate to remain until it is finished.

Mr. EATON. Will the Senator from Maine yield to me?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir; with the understanding that the bill now taken up shall be left as the unfinished business.

DEATH OF SENATOR O. S. FERRY.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I beg leave to offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of ORRIS S. FERRY, late Senator from Connecticut, the business of this body be now suspended, that his former associates may pay proper tribute to his public and private virtues.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate this resolution to the House of Representatives.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, the Reaper has indeed been busy in the Connecticut congressional field. Buckingham, FERRY, and STARKWEATHER! Within the short space of less than a year these three gifted men have been gathered to their fathers; three names honored by their native State and honoring her. Difficult will it be to fill the places so long and so worthily occupied by them.

The death of a valuable and eminent public servant is a loss deeply to be deplored by his immediate constituency, and demands at the hands of his former associates proper and seemly action. Thus impressed, I submit to the Senate the brief remarks which I shall offer on this mournful occasion. No fulsome eulogy will be pronounced by me. It would be alike unworthy of my character and the Spartan simplicity which was one of the leading characteristics of the late Senator FERRY.

ORRIS SANFORD FERRY was born in the town of Bethel, Fairfield County, State of Connecticut, on the 15th day of August, 1823. His father, a respectable inhabitant of Bethel, was largely engaged in the manufacture of hats, and at an early age young FERRY was apprenticed to that business. But soon discovering the bent of his mind and his aversion to the trade to which he had designed him, the father released him from his bonds, giving him such educational advantages as enabled him to graduate from Yale College in the year 1844. He pursued the study of the law under two eminent members of the profession in his native county and was admitted to the practice of that profession in 1846.

Mr. FERRY immediately took high rank as a counselor and advocate, and at an early age was justly regarded as in the front rank of the profession in Connecticut. His wonderful power of analysis and the magnetism of his oratory gave him great power with the court and jury, and as a platform speaker he had no superior and few equals in his State.

Mr. FERRY served in the State senate two sessions, 1855 and 1856, and exhibited distinguished ability both as a legislator and political leader. I was not a member of the Connecticut Legislature either of the terms that Mr. FERRY occupied his seat in the senate, but I saw much of his course and know the high estimate which was placed upon his powers by the leading men of the State.

In 1859 Mr. FERRY was elected to the other branch of the Federal Legislature and served through the session with marked ability.

Shortly after the commencement of the late terrible civil conflict, Mr. FERRY was commissioned by Governor Buckingham as colonel of the Fifth Regiment of Connecticut Volunteers, and he remained in the service until the close of hostilities. As an officer, I understand that he was respected by his superiors and beloved by those subjected to his command, performing all the duties devolved upon him with promptness and fidelity.

Resuming the practice of his profession in 1865, he was perhaps at the most successful period of his legal career when he was elected to the United States Senate for the term commencing March 4, 1867. From that time until his death, the story of O. S. FERRY is a part of the history of this body, and I hesitate not to say that by his manly and independent course in the Senate, though differing widely upon some matters from many of his political friends, he won the respect and high regard of all his associates.

This is not the proper occasion to speak at length upon his intellectual efforts upon this floor, so well calculated to bring forth his great powers, efforts which placed him in the front rank of Senators as a debater and constitutional lawyer.

Devotedly attached to the great principles which form the base of our system of government, whenever in his opinion those principles were menaced or endangered, even by the action of political friends, the chains of party allegiance were broken as a strong man rends asunder ropes of yarn, and all the energies of his body and mind were summoned to the conflict in support of such views as he believed to be right, just, and for the best interests of his country. One of the leading and governing traits of Mr. FERRY was his love of justice. He was eminently a just man. He never put to himself the question, Will it be politic to pursue a given course of action? The question which he mentally propounded was, Will it be just? And, once convinced of the justice of his position, he could neither be pursuaded nor driven from the ground which his calm judgment had pronounced correct.

As a politician he was above the petty arts and meannesses which small men use to attain high position.

His personal integrity was pure and spotless. The armorial bearings of the French Bayard might well have been claimed by him. Indeed he was truly—

Without fear and without reproach.

I should do injustice to my feelings if I failed to reproduce part of a letter from a distinguished divine, Rev. Dr. Childs, of Hartford, Connecticut.

Says Dr. Childs:

It is just ten years since my acquaintance with General FERRY commenced.

Letters from him carried me to Norwalk, his place of residence, and resulted ultimately in my becoming his pastor. He was then in the prime of life, forty-two years of age. With a magnificent physical organization, a genial disposition, a strong, clear, active mind, earnest, enthusiastic, impetuous, yet cautious, wonderfully popular, no man in the State probably had the elements or gave the promise of a brighter future The war was over, and he had returned to the practice of his profession, which opened to him all that his ambition could ask in that direction, and to the enjoyment of his home, which had for him stronger attractions than the scenes of public life.

With the movements that placed him in the National Senate I believe he had little to do. He was not a political manager. He was an honest man, and those who knew him best believed in him most fully. Even his political opponents never, as far as I am aware, questioned his perfect integrity. Intensely earnest in the cause that he espoused, he was more than a partisan. As a national legislator his views were always broader than his party. Acquainting himself thoroughly with the constitutional history of his country, a diligent student of the history of other nations, he developed an independent, wise, far-seeing statesmanship, which, had he not been arrested by the hand of disease, would have placed him—at least ought to have placed him—in the very front rank of political leaders. In my judgment there is no office in the gift of the people that General FERRY would not have filled with eminent ability.

Senators, I have done.

Through my associate and myself Connecticut mourns the loss of one of her most distinguished sons.

Through you, the representatives of the several States, the Federal Union expresses its deep sorrow at the loss of a wise, sagacious, and matured statesman, capable of lifting himself above the claims and behests of party in the discussion and consideration of questions involving the very life of the Federal system; a statesman whose profound genius entitles his name to be enrolled among the immortal few who knew how to make and keep a people!

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, on the 27th of February, 1875, Senators rose in their places to pay fitting tributes of respect and affection to the memory of a dead Senator of Connecticut, whose illustrious public service and private virtues had commanded our admiration and love.

Among those who eloquently spoke on that occasion—not yet a year ago—was the Senator whose loss we now deplore. He was himself then feeble in frame, and halted tremblingly to his seat in this Chamber, the victim of a disease that was rapidly and certainly drying up the springs of life; and I doubt not that the painful thought was in other minds as it was in my own, that ere long we might be called upon to mourn his loss and pay customary tribute to his memory. Yet his intellectual nature triumphed against the visible progress of disease, and he spoke with unexcelled force and beauty, and with deep feeling, of his associate and friend. His words come back to us today as singularly due to himself: "The plainest truth is his highest eulogy." He would not offend the modesty of the dead by words of boastful praise.

For himself, also, he seemed in the supreme moment impressed with the sentiment of that mournful elegy which shows the emptiness of fame, the monotonous level of the grave:

> Can honor's voice provoke the silent dust?
> Or flattery soothe the dull, cold ear of death?

From such thoughts came his dying request that no eulogistic sermon be preached at his grave. The spirit of that request restrains me in what I may say to-day. But it would belittle the truth not to say that we who knew him well know that he was distinguished for eminent ability and zeal in the public service; that his mind was clear, sharp, and flexible as a Damascus blade. His sense of duty brought him daily to this Chamber and to the committee-room when the excuse for absence, of inextinguishable pain, was ready and obvious.

Our friend was fortunate in his reputation. A man's character is built solely by himself. He constructs it piece by piece, to deformity or symmetry. It cannot be created or destroyed by another. But reputations are the sport of circumstance, or the prey of malice; often beyond the control of the possessor, and as often fictitious and unjust. Sometimes, as with the persecuted Galileo, this is the fault of the age; sometimes, as with blind and despised Milton, it is the license of party. Happy is the wise and good against whom the mob has never cried, "Crucify him! release to us Barabbas!"

I only wish to add that from daily association with Mr. FERRY, I learned to admire the rectitude visible in all his words and actions—a rectitude that seemed to spring not merely from a heart well guarded by conscience, but from an even poise of intellect, which could not incline to temptation or stoop to wrong.

The impressions left here by his daily walk and conversation were familiar to his friends and constituents at home. I listened to the simple statement of his virtues, of his Christian faith and works, by his pastor, who spoke to his neighbors as the cold form of the dead Senator rested at the altar of the little church at Norwalk, and heard the same testimony which we can all bear—that he was conscientious, just, upright.

Such men, whatever their party associations, elevate the public service. Their influence is good, not only in the traces they may leave in wholesome statutes, but in the higher respect of the people for free institutions challenged by their conspicuous integrity.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I have a sad satisfaction in yielding my tribute of sincere respect to the character and memory of our late associate, Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut, whose career has been so ably and well stated by his colleague, [Mr. EATON.]

There never was any personal intimacy between us, and our views as to party never brought us into that sympathy which is begotten of a common endeavor for political ends.

Yet even in his life-time and amid the ardor of differing opinions, so often forcibly and positively expressed, as was his wont, I was always conscious, whether concurring in or dissenting from his views, that back of his utterances there shone the light of truthful intent, which caused a radiance to pervade everything he said. It was the sense of honest conviction, uncolored and undimmed by petty partisan or unjust considerations.

The real strength and safety of this Government lies in the absolute freedom with which opinions may be formed and expressed, and to the independent and courageous utterances of its able and virtuous men the people may best look for guidance.

This day our country needs men who will proclaim their real judgments; not those who, to adopt a phrase that fell unpleasantly on my ear not long since in this Chamber, "follow in order to lead." One who loved England described her as—

> A land where, girt by friends or foes,
> A man may speak the thing he will.

For when this shall not be, true manliness and honest public service will have departed, and time-serving have taken their place.

The Senator whose death we so justly mourn possessed the qualities which can create and preserve a free government of laws.

He had a mind of excellent natural powers, well matured, and enlightened by study of the laws, both in their enactment and practical administration.

He had experience of men living under the orderly régime of law, and also under the less defined control of military rule in time of war.

So fitted by events, he came into this council chamber of the States of the Union somewhat heated perhaps upon his first entry by the scenes of warfare in which he had just been engaged, and in which, as a soldier, he had borne a brave, conscientious, and distinguished part. But, from the first, I well remember how instinctively he recoiled from unworthy or improper schemes, how unerringly he probed and detected fraud, and unsparingly denounced dishonesty and corruption, wherever and whenever found, with a generous indignation.

He lived a life of quiet self-respect. No busy seeker he of men's praises; no dexterous manager of party forces; no scatterer of ambiguous voices in the market-place.

It was because he was a true friend to popular institutions that he despised and shunned the arts of a demagogue; much less did he stoop to gather personal or party advantage in the flames of discord among his countrymen. Thus I believe he was fit to rule men and to execute the great trusts of political power.

I could produce abundant extracts from his speeches in this Chamber where his censure of what he deemed corrupt, dishonest, and unworthy was unhesitating and unsparing. And he never permitted the garb of party to shelter a guilty man from his just denunciation. For six years we served together upon the Committee on Private Land Claims, where cases involving the title or possession of extensive and valuable bodies of land came frequently before us. His intelligence, acumen, and fine legal and judicial abilities were in this way made known to me; and reports of important cases, comprehending questions of law and fact of a complicated nature, where lapse of time and fraud had combined to obscure truth and justice, were made by him and are on the files of the Senate, in which his vigorous and instinctively honest mind dissolved all doubts and arrayed the merits of the case in clear and orderly precision. The condition of physical health in which for years he performed his duties here must have touched and saddened us all; yet complaint was never heard from his lips, and he would force his weak body to its work with a vigor and courage that it is not extravagant to call heroic. To know him was to respect him. His life here has ended, but not I trust its influences upon those who survive and shall succeed him.

> Well may we mourn him;
> Well may we imitate his virtues.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I had not realized how peculiar and unique my relations with the late Senator FERRY had been until I sat down to consider what might be proper for me to say at his official funeral. I knew him first only when he entered the Senate; and I scarcely knew him anywhere else than in the Senate.

During his whole term of service here I was his colaborer; but I rarely saw him out of this Chamber. He never repelled me and was not at all repellant to me. I felt for him not only entire respect, but also great admiration; and therefore I was surprised to find upon reflection that I had never known him but in an official way and in his public character. During the whole time we worked together I never received from or made to him, so far as I remember, anything like a confidential communication. Nothing like a whispered or an aside remark ever passed between us. I rarely ever spoke to him or heard him speak upon other than public affairs. And when for an occasional moment he turned to the discussion of private interests, his wont was to discuss them in official style. If I asked after his health, or for the news of the day, his habit was to answer with the same fidelity to fact and the same accuracy of statement he would have employed in communicating with his physician or with a reporter for the Associated Press.

Once I ventured to applaud some unusually forcible and fervid remarks he made in the Senate. He answered me with a laugh, as little encouraging to my enthusiasm as if the splendid bronze charger on which sits Brown's statue of Scott should whinny when the admiring spectator claps his hands at the triumph of the artist. So I do not feel that I ever knew Mr. FERRY in any other character than that of a Senator. If indeed he had a life distinct or different from his public one, I was a stranger to it. My conclusion is that when he put on the senatorial robes he put them on for steady wear, that his purpose was to carry the proprieties of his great office constantly with him; not to be oppressed by them, still less to oppress any one by them, but to attract by and instruct with them everywhere and always.

I need not speak in this presence of the clearness or the vigor of his intellect. This Chamber, instructed by the loftiest utterances in our language, has witnessed too many evidences of both to make any mention of either profitable.

But more than most men he was sincere and earnest. Others have exhibited on special occasions and in pursuit of special ends more zeal than he was accustomed to betray, but few men of my acquaintance have seemed to burn with an ardor so constant and sustained as that which inspired him.

Two traits in his character deserve particular mention: his independence of thought and his fidelity to conviction.

He thought for himself and formed his own conclusions. He listened to the reasoning of others, but he was guided by his own. He was not likely to be the idol of a party, for he could not abjectly follow one. But he was not for that reason the more unsafe to lead a party, since he was sure to lead by the best light he had.

Perhaps less than others he realized the importance of organization to political achievement. Perhaps more than others he felt the importance of impressing individual opinion upon the public mind. Whatever might have been the cause, he seemed as prompt and resolute to attack what he deemed error in the party to which he belonged as in that to which he was opposed. At times, indeed, he appeared even more uncompromising toward his political associates than toward his political adversaries. There are those in the world still who hold that "unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required," and who are more intolerant of fault in their friends than in strangers.

Something must be pardoned to the exigencies of party as to the spirit of liberty. It is not wise to destroy a great party, freighted with precious hopes and struggling to noble ends, because it occasionally stumbles or for a moment seems to falter on its way. It is not wise to silence a great teacher, in whose light a generation has walked and the human race has visibly grown, because of a single fault, whether imputed or real. It is not wise to drag the moon from the planetary system because there are a few spots on it. Of course when the moon crumbles into ashes, and so flings dust and not light upon the beholder, it might as well be shoveled out of the system. When the teacher slips all the cables which moor him to truth, close reefs the hopes which waft him heavenward, and drifts out listless and rudderless upon the sea of unbelief, helplessly buffeted by all its waves and hopelessly clapboarded by all its barnacles, the sooner he goes to pieces the better. And when a party has sold itself to do evil, has coiled itself on the path of human progress; when it no longer seeks to give nurse to but rather to nurse upon its country, all good men should abandon it and unite to take it to pieces.

It is not easy always to discover the precise point where the paths of the partisan and of the patriot diverge. In every era men have been seen to desert the banners of party before the point of divergence was reached, and men have been seen to follow them long after that point was passed

Undoubtedly good husbandry will seek to garner up all the wheat; and good husbandry will burn the chaff. But some are so eager of grain they will continue to rake over the straw long after the wheat is all out; and some are so impatient of chaff they will kindle the fires in it while it is yet heavy with the bread of life.

The late Senator from Connecticut, however, never set fire to unthrashed harvests. He did not always keep even step with the party in which he trained, but he never deserted it. Occasionally perhaps by ill-timed contentions he obstructed its progress, but I think he never meant to imperil its final triumph.

I did not always agree to the correctness of his conclusions, but I never for a moment doubted the sincerity of them. And the fidelity with which he adhered to his convictions and the courage with which he asserted them was an instruction to us all and deserved all praise. Where he went belief and affirmation walked hand in hand. He seemed absolutely exempt from all physical and all moral tremors such as are born of fear. On the field and in the forum he flung himself into the encounter with equal readiness.

Within an hour after his State had offered him a regiment to lead to battle he accepted the solemn trust. We have seen him enter upon an engagement here with even less deliberation. Day after day he sat here racked with physical pains, but no moan escaped him. His body was enfeebled by disease, but his spirit never languished.

Wherever his sense of duty pointed the way, there he was sure to tread. By him adversaries were uncounted and results were uncalculated. His lips never expressed it, but his manner seemed to say with the young Prince of Tyre—

> Like a bold champion, I assume the lists,
> Nor ask advice of any other thought
> But faithfulness and courage.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, change is written on everything with which we are familiar. The spring, the summer, the golden autumn, and the icy winter chase each other, and while we recognize the one it is gone. The forest is no sooner clothed in its luxuriant foliage than it begins to disrobe, and presently its bare poles stand up against the sky. The creations of human industry and genius, whether of kingdom or code, of monument or picture, crumble away before this universal law. These changes are fraught with instruction, and remind us that we shall not long continue as we now are. But it is when the stern messenger calls away a companion distinguished for his genius and his eloquence, his purity, and his Christian faith that we learn the most impressive of moral lessons.

The average age of the members of this body is perhaps fifty years. In that past period a thousand, yes, nearer two thousand, millions of sentient beings such as we, capable of indefinite if not of infinite moral and intellectual development, have appeared upon the stage of time, there rejoiced and emulated, suffered and striven, and have then departed forever; their entry and their exit being alike mysterious.

Brief as has been their visit to earth, it has been long enough to effect several demonstrations:

It has proven that there is a spiritual as well as a material existence; for they were all conscious of being, and they were all recognized as being, in their personality, spiritual.

It has proven that they were moral intelligences, for no matter how enfeebled by want or how degraded by bad associations, there never was one of that mighty host, with every selfish inducement to decide in his own favor, who has not condemned and blamed himself for every wrong he committed.

It has proven, by the acquisitions those intelligences have made in languages and laws, in philosophy and art, that they are capable of perpetual progression.

It has proven that they were not the results of natural causes, for they have seized upon nature and made it subservient to their pleasure. The very elements have been subjected to their service; its obstacles, such as oceans and space, storms and lightnings, have been overcome and conquered.

Our race stands out the supernatural by an irrefragable logic. If this be not true, why admire the heroism of the martyr dying for his faith more than the fire that consumes him? Why render more homage to the patriot soldier who dies in front of the line than to the steed which spur and bridle have forced to the danger? Why more gratitude to a friendship that is true amid temptations to betray than to the steady current of the river that makes its way over rocks and precipices? It is man as a positive force superior to nature that we admire.

In him we to-day lament the intellectual and moral was in a marked degree predominant. His physical infirmities seemed to augment that supremacy. In the prime of life, shattered by disease, he resolutely and firmly adjusted himself to the situation. We have seen him standing there, advocating those measures he believed best for his country, while his countenance was distorted from pain. His spirit firmly held the mastery over physical forces. They could not carry the citadel of his soul.

He had, too, marked independence of character and thought, and possessed the concomitant virtue of courage. He was satisfied of his ability by investigation to arrive at a sound conclusion. He knew that his motives were pure and honest, and when his opinions were formed he was not to be swerved from them. Though not indifferent to popular opinion, as no sound mind is, he had much of the spirit of that old hero who said, "Were there as many devils in Worms as roof-tiles, I would on."

I did not always think him right, but I always felt re-assured where I found myself voting as he voted.

He was a man of good education and attainments. He had not high culture; few men have. High culture is not essential to excellence or usefulness; if it were, our republican institutions, State and national, would be in a sad condition. His education was sufficient to have developed his native powers and to render him conscious of his strength, so that he went fearlessly and successfully forward as a leader in life's duties.

Mr. FERRY'S reasoning powers were of a superior order, and were habitually fortified by careful reflection on the subject he would present. He seized the strong point of the question under investigation and wielded it with great power. In presenting his views he was direct, plain, and logical, and in that he impressed his hearers with the strength of his own convictions, so that they sympathized with him; he was eloquent.

When that terrible calamity, the record of which is found in thousands of desolate homes, overtook our country, his patriotism shone forth. A Representative of the nation, he became a patrol to guard its capital; and afterward, at the head of the Fifth Connecticut Cavalry, bravely participated in its battles. But his patriotism was not sectional; it was not a narrow sentiment, confined to any locality. He fought to preserve here for all his country that civil liberty which, while the greatest of blessings, is conferred upon only a few spots of earth. He believed that he was contending for the right. I do not say he would not say that many of those with whom he contended did not, from their stand-point, think they were right. But this is true: when everywhere in this free Republic law shall be supreme, the rights of property and person secure, and constitutional political equality exercised and protected, then, when civil liberty is thus established, and we rejoice in the prosperity, peace, and virtue that flow from it, all will remember past differences only to be the more grateful that we are again friends.

It was the crowning glory of our friend that he was a Christian. Conscious of a spiritual malady which human culture or educational development could not cure, he sought and found for a disease to the supernatural a supernatural remedy.

He has gone from us forever. Whither has he gone? All of him that is mortal quietly reposes in the soil of the gallant State that delighted to honor him. His memory is embalmed in the hearts of many loving countrymen, and his spirit has returned to the bosom of his Father.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I have a few very sincere words to say of our deceased brother—words of sincere admiration of his character. That he was a man of intellect all who knew him will bear witness; that he was a speaker of singular perspicuity and force all who ever heard him can testify; that his mind was cultivated, his manners refined, his bearing dignified, simple, and wholly free from ostentation, is known to us all. But to me, as no doubt to others, the great trait of his character was its broad, enlightened, and fearless independence. He was one of that class of men—too limited in every land and in every age—who think for themselves and dare to say what they think. Paying due regard to the opinions of others and always willing to receive instruction, he nevertheless was careful to assert his brain and manhood by ultimately deciding for himself. And he had a breadth and grasp of mind, a magnanimity of soul, and a sense of justice that ever inclined him to measures of moderation and kindness; and in such measures his reason, his learning, and his feelings found the truest statesmanship. I might give not a few illustrations of these characteristics from the records and debates of the Senate, but this is not an occasion to speak of matters that have not yet passed out of the region of controversy. Time, in my opinion, will vindicate the soundness of his judgment; his honesty of purpose needs no vindication, for no one was ever found to question that.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, I first met the late Senator FERRY in 1873, when I took a seat in this Chamber. He was then suffering from the disease which condemned him to partial seclusion and finally ended his life. I was not without prejudice against him, and should never have known him intimately had I not been associated with him upon the committee of which he was chairman. Thus brought into social relations with him my prejudice vanished, and I soon learned to admire the clearness and strength of his intellect and the purity and beauty of his character. Our acquaintance, on my part at least, grew into warm friendship, to which I should do violence were I to constrain myself to silence on this occasion.

The events of his life have been so fully traced by his colleague that I will only glance at them. Born in Connecticut, and always residing in his native county of Fairfield, his honors must have been doubly dear as coming from those who had known him from childhood. In youth he wrought in his father's manufactory, where he acquired a practical knowledge, which he sometimes unexpectedly exhibited to the discomfiture of those who assumed his want of it.

He graduted at Yale College, the alma mater of so many distinguished Americans, and chose the legal profession. We who knew him here cannot doubt that he deserved and won professional distinction, especially as an advocate. His strong common sense, his earnestness, born of intense convictions, his inborn and irrepressible love of right and justice, his contempt and hatred for meanness and wrong, and the mingled logic and feeling which animated his speech must have won the minds and the hearts of the clear-headed, strong-minded men who generally compose the juries of New England.

After two years of faithful service in the Connecticut senate and three years' performance of the duties of prosecuting attorney in the county of Fairfield, he was, in April, 1859, elected to the national House of Representatives, where he served till March, 1861. In the midst of all-pervading treason which seemed to forbode the sure downfall of the Republic, his unselfish patriotism led him to enlist and serve as a private soldier in a company raised to defend the national Capitol from the foes that menaced it from within and without. In the great struggle which preserved national unity and free institutions to our people he took no uncertain nor wavering part. His patriotism and his humanity alike condemned a rebellion which would have divided our country into independent and hostile States, without peace at home or power abroad, and which would have erected upon the ruins of American freedom a government with human slavery for its cornerstone.

Having been appointed by Governor Buckingham to the command of the Fifth Connecticut Regiment he obtained by arduous study a knowledge of military affairs, and with his regiment did faithful and honorable service. Commissioned brigadier-general in 1862 he served with gallantry till the end of the war, when he resumed the practice of his profession at Norwalk. In 1867 he was elected to this Senate, and re-elected in 1872. His last public effort in this Chamber was to pronounce a true and beautiful eulogy upon his friend and colleague, Senator Buckingham. Much in that eulogy might be applied to the lamented FERRY himself. In it he seemed to be sounding his own requiem. The sorrowful task of preparing it almost overcame him and admonished him that his own hold on life was rapidly breaking and that his feet were even then pressing the shore of that dark river over which his friend had passed to the unseen world. In vain he sought relief from medicine; it had no shield against the stroke of death. The dying Vice-President sent to him a message of love which never reached him. They died within a few hours of each other—loved, trusted, and mourned.

In the character of Senator FERRY it seems to me there was almost everything to admire, and almost nothing to condemn.

His intellect was clear, powerful, and logical. Few better speeches than his can be found in the records of American eloquence. Terse, vigorous, and full of fiery force, they were delivered with an earnestness of manner which gave them wonderful effect. His hearers felt that before them was a man who believed what he said, and who said it because he believed it. When warmed in debate his impulsive energy seemed to triumph over the cruel disease which, like the vulture of Prometheus, was gnawing his vitals. Yet, with all his mental strength, he had the ardent generosity and captivating frankness of youth and a feminine kindness of heart. The poor, the oppressed, the unhappy multitude whose lives are darkened by want, had never a friend whose heart beat for them with stronger sympathy. His love of right, of justice, of what Anglo-Saxons call "fair play," amounted to a passion. Yet he never stooped to flatter nor amuse the people to whose welfare he devoted himself. His public addresses never appealed to the baser passions, but only to the sentiments of justice and duty in the hearts of his hearers and to their judgment and reason. He was a patriot without being a demagogue.

He was by nature a man of unyielding courage, and in his later years his fear of God shut his heart against all other fear. He had the courage to be true to his convictions always and everywhere. No unpopularity of a cause could prevent his warmly espousing it. His independence of thought sometimes led to breaches of party discipline which would have been fatal to men of less purity, but which never lost him the confidence of those who knew him. They knew that no selfish, dishonest motive could influence him. His character shielded him even against suspicion. They felt that modern degeneracy had not reached him; that, though poor, he could not be swayed by all "the gold of Ormus and of Ind." Their faith in him was well-founded. His feet were firmly planted on that eternal rock where stood in other days the martyrs who endured poverty, scorn, insult, torture, and death rather than disobey the whispers of conscience—that "still, small voice" too often unheeded by men in high places. Yet he made no parade of his religion; it was concealed rather than ostentatiously displayed, and consisted in acts rather than in words. When some glaring examples of hypocrisy brought contumely upon the religious professions of statesmen, the pure, noble, honest life of FERRY did much to redeem genuine Christianity from reproach.

He once said to me that he tried to live as though the next moment would usher him to the bar of the Eternal Judge. To a man who thus lives, seeing continually the white throne of Omnipotence with the children of earth thronging to it for judgment, nothing is harder than to do wrong, and to him death is but the door to immortality. Though he leaves here no earthly riches, he leaves what is better—a stainless name and an example for emulation.

When we look upon such a life and such a death, when we reflect how often of late the pale king of terrors has invaded this Chamber and how soon we may receive his dread summons, shall we not be incited to the more faithful performance of our duties—duties involving the welfare of many millions of our fellow-men, which we owe to them, to our country, and to God?

Mr. ENGLISH. Mr. President, one year ago last Saturday Mr. FERRY rose in his seat in this Chamber, in the performance of what he said was to him the saddest duty of his public life, to announce to the Senate the death of his colleague on this floor. On the 27th day of this same month he delivered in the Senate a eulogy on the life and character of Governor Buckingham which made a deep impression on the Senate and country at that time. It was his last public effort in the Senate. He returned to his family and home in Norwalk, where he died on the 23d day of November last.

By the dispensation of Providence, the State of Connecticut has lost by death not only two Senators, but quite recently one of her senior members in the House of Representatives, making, in all, one-half of her entire delegation in Congress, and all within the brief space of less than one year. It is but seldom that a State is called upon to endure such a triple affliction as her citizens mourn to-day.

Such, Mr. President, is the uncertainty of human life, and it admonishes us all to heed the divine admonition, "Be ye also ready."

To-day the Senate testifies its respect for the memory of Mr. FERRY.

Mr. President, while I had not the honor of serving with Mr. FERRY as a member of this distinguished body, it was my good fortune to know him long and to know him well. From my earliest acquaintance I had learned to respect him, not only for his superior abilities, but as a man of noble impulses and great purity of character.

Born among the hills of Connecticut, where he derived his first educational advantages in the public schools and where he learned to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow; apprenticed at an early age, in his native town of Bethel, to his father, a prominent manufacturer of hats in that town; while thus engaged, he exhibited such a taste for books and knowledge as to induce his father to send him to Yale College, whence he was graduated in 1844. Of his class, Governor Haight, of California, and Governor and Senator Washburn, of Massachusetts, became the most prominent in political life. While in college he was not distinguished as a scholar, but as a writer and debater he was conspicuous and of great promise. He was thoroughly independent, and gave evidence of a noble and strong character.

His professional, military, and political life has been so ably presented by my distinguished colleague as to leave little or nothing more to be said upon these heads.

His speeches in the Senate were marked by great clearness of expression and force of utterance, and always commanded attention. He was in the best sense an eloquent man, because he spoke his convictions of duty, and had opinions, solid and strong, of his own. He dared to differ from his party and be true to his individual convictions, to his sense of duty, to his country, and to his God.

His recent efforts in this Chamber, in support of what he believed to be for the best interests of the country, are so fresh in the minds of the people as to make it unnecessary for me to recur to them.

During his whole public service, and often in situations in which bribes or gifts might have been accepted, such was his sterling integrity he was placed beyond the reach of temptation. As a Senator he had a clear conception not only of the duties but the responsibilities of the position, and was fearless in the discharge of those duties. When he spoke, he spoke as a statesman, and not as a politician; for politician he never was, nor could he be, certainly not in that sense that makes politics a profession, whereby offices of honor or profit may be obtained. Nor was he in any sense an office-seeker. He would neither seek nor ask for any office of honor or profit, nor did he crave any. But, on the contrary, had he been governed by his own impressions, regardless of the opinions of others, he would have continued in the practice of his much-loved profession, and which would have been greatly to his pecuniary advantage. But from a sense of duty he accepted the high and honorable position to which he was elected by his fellow-citizens, having but one object in view, to discharge the duties of the same in such a manner as would conduce to the best good of his State and country.

Mr. FERRY, from disease and bodily infirmity, had been a very great sufferer for several years, which would have completely discouraged a less determined man; but he struggled on, and by his indomitable will continued in the discharge of the duties of his office of Senator up to the close of the last session. But, as time rolled on, his physical vigor became paralyzed. Suffering bodily pain and agony, with the fact of approaching death before him, he still continued faithfully to discharge every duty, until at last his physical strength gave way; but his mental power held out until the end.

It may not, Mr. President, be inappropriate for me to allude to the Christian character of Mr. FERRY and the esteem in which he was held at home among his friends and fellow-citizens. He was a man of an emotional nature and instinctive reverence for spiritual truth. In his decided religious impressions he showed great energy of mind and independence of character. His political life had given him a rapid growth of reputation for intellect and capacity. At home, among his fellow-citizens, he had obtained great influence, not only as a public man, but in the church, of which he was a devoted member as well. He taught a Bible-class, and out of his efforts to do good to his charge he prepared a course of lectures in support of the divine origin of Christianity, which was numerously attended and produced a profound impression.

Struggling against infirmity, which sapped the springs of life, he held on bravely to the end, sustained by a noble ardor and indomitable pluck, by his Christian faith and heroism, and died the death of a Christian patriot, deeply lamented by all of his friends and fellow-citizens.

Mr. President, I beg leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That, as an additional mark of respect for the memory of Mr. FERRY, the Senate do now adjourn.

The resolution was agreed to unanimously; and the Senate (at two o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 8, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND, D. D.

The SPEAKER. Before the reading of the Journal is begun the Chair will state that, the Journal of yesterday's proceedings being lengthy, he will, unless objection be made, direct the Clerk to abbreviate somewhat the reading, so as to save a quarter of an hour or more.

There was no objection.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 1053) providing for the payment of judgments rendered under section 11 of chapter 459 of the laws of the first session of the Forty-third Congress; when the Speaker signed the same.

ACTIONS IN CASES OF DEATH FROM WRONGFUL ACTS, ETC.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twenty-three minutes to one o'clock, and the regular order of business is the call of committees for reports of a public nature, the call resting with the Committee on the Judiciary. The pending question is on the bill (H. R. No. 1210) authorizing actions in cases of death resulting from wrongful act, neglect, or default, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary on Thursday morning last by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] and pending at the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I ask that the bill be read as amended by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill was read, as follows:

That whenever the death of a person shall be caused in the District of Columbia by the wrongful act, neglect, or default of any person or corporation, and the act, neglect, or, default is such as would (if death had not ensued) have entitled the party injured, or, if she be a married woman, her husband, either separately or together with her, to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof, then, and in every such case, the person who or corporation which would have been liable if death had not ensued shall be liable to an action for damages for the injuries resulting from such death, notwithstanding the death of the person injured and although the death shall have been caused under such circumstances as amount in law to a felony: Provided, That in no such case shall the recovery exceed the sum of $5,000.

SEC. 2. That every such action shall be brought by and in the name of the personal representative of such deceased person, and within twelve calendar months after his or her death. The jury in any such action may award such damages as to it may seem fair and just, and may direct in what proportion they shall be distributed to the wife, husband, parent, and child of the deceased.

SEC. 3. That the amount recovered in any such action shall, after the payment of costs and reasonable attorneys' fees, be paid to the wife, husband, parent, and child of the deceased, in such proportion as the jury may have directed, or, if they have not directed, according to the statute of distributions, and shall be free from all debts and liabilities of the deceased; but, if there be no wife, husband, parent, or child, the amount so recovered shall be assets in the hands of the personal representatives, to be disposed of according to law.

SEC. 4. That the rights of action under this act shall not determine, nor shall such actions when brought abate, by the death of the defendant.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker, this is the bill which I had the privilege of introducing on the 18th of January. It has been considered by the Judiciary Committee, and in the form in which it is recommended by them has already been read to the House.

I will state in a few words what this bill is, the necessity for it, and its purpose and effect.

To those who are familiar with "Lord Campbell's act," passed in England in 1846, and similar statutes in many of the States of our Union, it will be sufficient to say this bill is in most respects substantially the same as those.

There is no statute in the District of Columbia similar to any of those I have mentioned, and this bill is reported simply to provide the same remedies here which now exist in England and many of our States.

The bill simply gives a right of action for the benefit of those who are most aggrieved and injured when "the death of a person shall be caused by the wrongful act, neglect, or default of any person or corporation," and it authorizes a recovery of damages "for the injuries resulting from such death, notwithstanding the death of the party injured." The amount recovered is by the terms of the bill to go "to the wife, husband, parent, and child of the deceased;" or, if there be none such, then it is to "be assets in the hands of the personal representatives, to be disposed of according to law," for creditors and distributees of the deceased.

This, then, in brief, is the bill.

The necessity for it is well understood by lawyers and those familiar with the statutes to which I have referred.

The "common law" generally is in force in the District of Columbia, and the statutes of Maryland existing on the 16th of July, 1790, (1 Statutes at Large, 130,) except so far as since repealed or changed by competent authority in the District. But neither the common law, nor these statutes of Maryland, nor any act of Congress or other law of the District gives a remedy for the injuries provided for in this bill. It is to be carefully noted that in cases of death resulting from the "wrongful act, neglect, or default of any person or corporation" there may be two classes of injuries.

First. If the person injured survives for a time and finally dies in a longer or shorter period he may suffer in the interruption of his business, in his feelings, and in the impaired power or loss of the faculties of his body and mind. These are injuries to him. While he yet survives he has by the common law a right of action which he may prosecute to judgment, and if he subsequently dies it is assets in the hands of his personal representatives as other chattel property.

But by the common law, if the party injured dies either before suit brought or after suit but before final judgment, the right of action is gone, and the personal representatives cannot commence an action or proceed with one already commenced.

This all rests upon a maxim of the common law: "Actio personalis moritur cum persona."

This rule applies only to personal actions for torts, whether resulting in death or not. Hence, if a party dies from natural causes, his personal actions for tort determine, and pending suits on such causes of action abate.

In many of the States this rule of the common law is abrogated by statute as to all or some classes, of personal rights of action and pending actions for torts, and suits may be commenced, or, if commenced, may be revived, in favor of the personal representatives.

This rule of the common law has been abrogated in Massachusetts, and by express statute such rights of action survive. Hence in Bancroft vs. The Boston and Worcester Railroad Company, 11 Allen (Massachusetts) Reports, 34, the court held that—

An action at law to recover damages for an injury which causes immediate insensibility and death in fifteen minutes survives to the administrator of the estate of the deceased.

That case was twice before the supreme court, and was argued with great ability by my distinguished friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] The result was that the court held that, although the injured party survived but fifteen minutes, he during that time had a right of action at common law, and this was preserved by the statute to his personal representative.

In this class of cases damages are given only for the injury to the person in his life-time, not including anything on account or by reason of the death.

In this District the law in this class of cases is rather in an anomalous and certainly very unsatisfactory condition. If a party who suffers a personal injury by the tort of another can, before either party dies, commence a suit, it then can be prosecuted by or against the proper personal representatives. But if either party dies before the suit is commenced, the right of action determines, and no suit can be prosecuted. This is clear from the language of the statutes. The Maryland statute of November, 1785, in force in the District of Columbia, provides:

That no action brought or to be brought in any court of law in this State shall abate by the death of either of the parties to such action. (See compilation of laws in force in District of Columbia, April 1, 1868, page 432.)

The statute of November, 1798, relating to wills, executors, and administrators provides that—

No personal action shall abate by the death of either party, but executors and administrators shall notice and conform to the directions of the act of 1785. (Compilation of 1868, page 64.)

The same act provides that—

Executors and administrators shall have full power and authority to commence and prosecute any personal action whatever in law or equity which the testator or intestate might have commenced and prosecuted, except actions of slander and for injuries or torts done to the person; and they shall also be liable to be sued in any court of law or equity in any action (except as aforesaid) which might have been maintained against the deceased. (Page 52.)

This is so manifestly unjust that a remedy should be provided, as in many other States, by express statute.

So much then for the right of action for damages resulting to the party injured in his life-time.

Second. But in cases of death there is another or second class of injuries. If a husband suffer a personal injury by the wrongful act, neglect, or default of another, and death be thereby caused, either immediately or as a direct effect after a short or longer period of time, serious damage may result to the wife and children as a consequence of the death.

These injuries may be pecuniary or social or personal in their character or all of these.

If the death of a wife be caused in the same way the same injuries may result to husband and children.

If the death of a child be caused, similar injuries may result to parents.

If there be neither wife, husband, parent, nor child, an injury may still result to creditors or distributees of the deceased, though in a less degree.

In all these cases the injury or damages I have referred to result from the death, and are wholly distinct from those to the person injured in his life-time.

The bill now under consideration gives an action for the injuries which result from the death. The actions it authorizes do not embrace personal injuries or damages to the deceased in his life-time. It does not bar or exclude a prosecution for those as in the case I have referred to in Massachusetts. This must be clear from several considerations:

First. If in the life-time of the party injured he commence his common-law action, the suit, in Massachusetts and many other States, by force of express statutes would not abate. It would proceed in the name of the personal representatives. And yet when an action is given by express statute for injuries resulting from death, that right of action is not by any express provision of law, or by any inference barred or excluded. On the contrary it is an express statutory right in England and in the States where such statutes exist.

Second. The common law action for the injury to the person in life is for a wholly different cause than that resulting from the death.

Third. By the provisions of Lord Campbell's act, and other similar statutes, the recovery will generally go to different parties.

Fourth. By way of analogy to a well-known rule for the construction of statutes, these two rights of action are separate and distinct; the statutory right of action is additional or cumulative to the common-law right.

Where a mode of pursuing a remedy exists at common law, and a statutory mode is given with no words to negative the common law remedy, the statutory remedy is cumulative. The authorities for this are numerous.

The circumstances which make the death a source of suffering to the parties in whose behalf the action is brought would be proper to consider when the statute does not limit the damages to pecuniary considerations.

The explanation of this bill which I have now given, as it seems to me, answers an objection to it made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] when it was first reported to the House from the Judiciary Committee.

And now a few words as to a particular feature of the bill.

The New York statute declares that—

The jury may give such damages as they shall deem a fair and just compensation, not exceeding $5,000, with reference to the pecuniary injury resulting from such death.

Lord Campbell's act does not have the word "pecuniary," and says—

The jury may give such damages as they may think proportioned to the injury resulting from such death to the parties, respectively, to whom and for whose benefit such action shall be brought.

The bill under consideration is made purposely to exclude the word "pecuniary," to make it clear that evidence of pecuniary injury is not required, and so that the damages may not be limited to such injury.

I will state one further reason, in addition to the four already given, why this bill does not bar or exclude the common-law action for injuries to the deceased party in his life-time.

Fifth. The remedy for these different classes of injuries may be in distinct courts, and by widely different judicial proceedings.

In Massachusetts the common-law remedy is by civil action at law.

The remedy for injuries resulting from death are by indictment and fine, to be "paid to the executor or administrator for the use of the widow and children of the deceased." (Massachusetts General Statutes, 1860, page 794, chapter 160, § 34; Shearman and Redfield on Negligence, § 294.)

There are cases where it has been held that the jury may consider the sufferings of the deceased, and may give exemplary damages. (Bowler vs. Lane, 3 Metcalfe, Kentucky, 311; Chiles vs. Drake, 2 idem., 146; Goodsell vs. Hartford Railroad, 33 Connecticut, 51; Murphy vs. New Haven Railroad, 29 Connecticut, 496; same case, 80 Connecticut, 184; Soule vs. New Haven Railroad, 24 Connecticut, 575.)

If the "sufferings" be considered merely as evidence of the extent or character of a wrong resulting from gross or willful misconduct, it may be well only as furnishing a reason for exemplary damages in a case where damages are not limited to mere pecuniary considerations. But, as a substantive ground of damages, they belong to the common-law action, and not to that furnished by the statute. (Shearman and Redfield on Negligence, § 610; Blake vs. Midland Railroad, 18 Queen's Bench, 93; Safford vs. Drew, 3 Duer, 627; Lehman vs. Brooklyn, 29 Barbour, 234; Telfer vs. Northern Railroad, 30 New Jersey, Law, 188; Chicago vs. Major, 18 Illinois, 349; Chicago vs. Morris, 26 Illinois, 400; Pennsylvania Railroad vs. Henderson, 51 Pennsylvania State, 315; Kresler vs. Smith, 66 North Carolina, 154; Pennsylvania Railroad vs. Zeebe, 33 Pennsylvania State, 318; Pennsylvania Railroad vs. Keller, 67 Pennsylvania State, 300.)

The bill follows the statute of Virginia, Kentucky, and Connecticut in not limiting the damages merely to pecuniary loss or injury. (Shearman and Redfield on Negligence, 611; Bowler vs. Same, 3 Metcalfe, Kentucky, 311; Chiles vs. Drake, 2 Metcalfe, Kentucky, 146; Goodsell vs. Hartford Railroad, 33 Connecticut, 51; Murphy vs. New Haven Railroad, 29 Connecticut, 496; same case, 80 Connecticut, 184; Soule vs. New Haven Railroad, 24 Connecticut 575.) The evidence of pecuniary loss is not essential to maintain the action for nominal damages. (Oldfield vs. Harlem Railroad Company, 14 New York, 310; Quin vs. Moore, 15 New York, 432; Lyons vs. Cleveland Railroad, 7 Ohio State, 336; Chicago vs. Major, 18 Illinois, 349.)

But I need not further discuss the bill. It is one which common justice requires us to pass. The protection of life and the safety of persons require it. Its policy is now universally recognized as one to be maintained.

This bill has the sanction of the Judiciary Committee, and, as it is substantially in the form in which similar laws have been adopted in the States. I apprehend there will be but little objection to it, and therefore demand the previous question.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for five minutes.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for that time.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman who has charge of this bill will be willing to strike out the proviso in the first section, that in no case shall the recovery of damages exceed the sum of $5,000. I desire to give him a little information concerning the experience of Pennsylvania with regard to such a law. In 1851 the State of Pennsylvania passed a law allowing compensation for damages arising out of injuries of this character. In 1855 it provided the manner in which damages when recovered should be distributed among the parties who might have been aggrieved, namely: the husband, widow, children, or parents, as provided in case of intestate personal property. In 1868, the damages then being left entirely to the discretion of the jury, a railroad influence which pervaded the Legislature of Pennsylvania caused a law to be passed limiting the damages for injuries to the person not producing death to the amount of $3,000 and in case of death to the amount of $5,000. This was found to be exceedingly injudicious, and in many cases unequal and unjust. There were cases occurring continually in which the amount of damages thus limited was entirely inadequate. Men were maimed and rendered helpless for life, and the income arising from such a small pittance was no amount of consideration for the kind of injury they sustained. A constitutional convention was held in Pennsylvania in 1873, and recognizing the inadequacy of the law providing for cases of this kind, where the cases were aggravated, it put into the constitution of the State adopted in 1874 a provision of this kind:

ARTICLE III.

SEC. 21. No act of the General Assembly shall limit the amount to be recovered for injuries resulting in death or for injuries to persons or property; and in case of death from such injuries the right of action shall survive, and the General Assembly shall prescribe for whose benefit such actions shall be prosecuted.

There was at that time existing in the law a limitation as to the time at which the action should be brought, limiting it, as in the present bill, to the period of a single year. but the convention proceeded to remove that limitation by the following additional paragraph:

No act shall prescribe any limitations of time within which such suits may be brought against corporations for injuries to persons or property, or for other causes different from those fixed by general laws regulating actions against natural persons, and such acts now existing are avoided.

As the constitution and law now stand in Pennsylvania, there is no limitation as to the amount of damages that may be recovered for injuries to the person not causing death or to injuries causing death. The whole matter is, as it ought always to be, left to the discretion of the jury, and I trust that the gentleman who has charge of the bill will consent to strike out that proviso which limits the amount to $5,000; for it can readily be seen injuries may result to persons which would be inadequately compensated by $5,000. The death of an individual might to his family be a loss equal to twenty or thirty thousand dollars. I therefore think it is exceedingly injudicious to restrict the amount of damages, but that it should be left entirely to the discretion of the jury, who, after hearing the case, would decide justly and equitably between the plaintiff and defendant.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker, when I introduced the bill I fixed the amount of the recovery which might be authorized by the act at $10,000, just as it is in Ohio, Virginia, and some other States. In New York the limitation is $5,000. The Judiciary Committeethought it judicious to limit the amount in this bill to $5,000. There is danger that if the amount be left open there may be unjust and exorbitant verdicts rendered, and it has been thought advisable in many of the States where these laws exist to fix some limit to the amount of the verdict. Now, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania thinks it desirable to move to strike out $5,000 and insert $10,000, I am perfectly willing that he shall take the sense of the House on that point. But I do not feel authorized to consent to any change, because this is the report of the Judiciary Committee, and not of myself.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Then I move to amend the bill by striking out $5,000 and inserting $10,000.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio withdraw the demand for the previous question?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I do, to enable the gentleman from Pennsylvania to offer his amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania, there were—ayes 59, noes 39; no quorum voting.

So (further count not being demanded) the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move as an additional section to the bill the provision which I send to the desk. In this District personal rights of action do not survive. It is to remedy that defect and make the law here conform to what it is in some—perhaps many—of the States of the Union that I offer this amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill as a new section the following:
SEC. 5. That no personal action or right of action shall determine or abate by the death of either party, whether such right of action be authorized by this act or otherwise.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. LAPHAM. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to make a single suggestion?

Mr. LAWRENCE. Certainly.

Mr. LAPHAM. I am opposed to that portion of this bill which gives the jury the power of distributing the damages to the wife, husband, parent, or child of the deceased.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It is impossible to get the bill into a shape in which it will suit everybody. I must insist on calling the previous question.

Mr. LAPHAM. I desire to submit a motion that the bill be referred back to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to amend it with reference to the point I have indicated.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I cannot agree to that. The bill has been carefully considered by the committee.

Mr. CONGER. Then we can vote it down.

Mr. LAPHAM. Yes; I hope the House will vote it down.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I hope not. The bill has been carefully considered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that the amendments reported by the Committee on the Judiciary have not yet been concurred in by the House.

The amendments reported by the committee were as follows:

In section 1, line 12, after the word "damages" insert "for the injuries resulting from such death;" so it will read, "the person who or corporation which would have been liable if death had not ensued shall be liable to an action for damages for the injuries resulting from such death notwithstanding the death of the person injured," &c.

In section 1, line 15, after the word "no" insert the word "such;" so it will read, "but in no such case shall the recovery exceed," &c.

In section 3, line 8, strike out "received" and insert "recovered;" so it will read, "the amount so recovered shall be assets in the hand of the personal representatives," &c.

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the passage of the bill.

Mr. LAPHAM. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, there were—ayes 68, noes 59; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER. Is further count required?

Mr. CONGER. I think we had better have tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. LAWRENCE and Mr. CONGER were appointed.

The House again divided and the tellers reported—ayes 97, noes 62.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to amend the title of the bill by adding the words "and for other purposes."

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SECTION 856 OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. HUNTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 555) to amend section 856 of the Revised Statutes.

The bill was read. It proposes to amend section 856 of the Revised Statutes by adding thereto the following: "And in the adjustment of the accounts of said officers an appeal shall lie from the decision of the accounting-officers of the Treasury to the Attorney-General, whose determination shall be final."

Mr. HUNTON. That the amendment may be understood, I ask the Clerk to read section 856 of the Revised Statutes, of which it is an amendment.

The Clerk read, as follows:

The fees of district attorneys, clerks, marshals, and commissioners, in cases where the United States are liable to pay the same, shall be paid on settling their accounts at the Treasury.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill be again reported.

The bill was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. There was some confusion in the House when the section of the Revised Statutes which it is proposed to amend was read. I do not think it was distinctly heard, and I ask that it be again read.

Section 856 of the Revised Statutes was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from Virginia inform the House who is the accounting-officer who has the settlement of this class of fees; whether he is one of the Comptrollers or the Fifth Auditor? It does not seem to be well understood what particular officer of the Treasury has the adjustment of these fees.

Mr. HUNTON. It is one of the Auditors.

The bill was passed.

Mr. HUNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUITS AGAINST CORPORATIONS.

Mr. LYNDE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1250) extending the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States in suits against corporations; and the same was laid on the table.

BANKRUPT CASES IN THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. LYNDE also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 356) concerning cases in bankruptcy commenced in the supreme courts of the several Territories prior to the 22d of June, 1874, and now undetermined therein.

The bill was read. It provides that in all cases in bankruptcy commenced in the supreme courts of any of the Territories of the United States prior to the 22d day of June, 1874, and now undetermined therein, the clerks of the said several courts shall immediately transmit to the clerks of the district courts of the several districts of said Territories all the papers in, and a certified transcript of, all the proceedings had in each of said cases; and the said clerks of the district courts shall immediately file the said papers and transcripts as papers and transcripts in the said district courts.

The second section provides that the clerks of the several supreme courts shall transmit the papers and transcripts provided for in section 1 of the act, in each case, to the clerk of the district court of the district wherein the bankrupt or bankrupts, or some one of them, resided at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy in said case; and as soon as the said papers and transcript in any case shall have been transmitted and filed, as herein provided, the district court in which the same shall have been so filed shall have jurisdiction of the said case, to hear and determine all questions arising therein, and to finally adjudicate and determine the same in all respects as contemplated in other bankruptcy cases by the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," and approved March 2, 1867, and amendments thereto.

Mr. LYNDE. Mr. Speaker, I will state that the bill merely applies to the trying in the Territories of cases commenced previous to the passage of the law of 1874, conferring on the district courts jurisdiction in bankrupt cases. Before that time the supreme courts of the Territories had exclusive jurisdiction in bankrupt cases, but some of the district courts of the Territories have decided that their jurisdiction only extended to bankrupt cases brought before the passage of that law, and as to cases brought previous to the passage of that law they say that their jurisdiction is taken away. The object of this bill is to confer on the district courts in the Territories jurisdiction in cases which occurred before the passage of the act of 1874.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I believe that this bill is satisfactory to all the Delegates from the Territories.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will allow an amendment to the bill for the repeal of the bankrupt law. I hope he will consent that the bill be so amended as to repeal that law.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I hope the gentleman will not raise that question in connection with this bill.

Mr. LYNDE. I would inform the gentleman from Indiana that I have a bill to report to repeal the bankrupt law; that this bill is in relation to cases pending in the supreme courts of the Territories, and it is desirable that those cases should be disposed of in some way or other.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me that the repeal of the bankrupt law would be in harmony with this bill, but as the Committee on the Judiciary having charge of the subject prefer that it should be reported in a separate bill, of course I have no wish to embarrass the passage of this bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LYNDE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 53) fixing the time of holding the circuit courts of the United States in the districts of California, Oregon, and Nevada.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 259) for the benefit of the Louisville Baptist Orphans' Home; and

A bill (S. No. 269) for the relief of John A. Torrence.

REPEAL OF THE BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. LYNDE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with an amendment, and with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 390) to repeal the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 21, 1867, and all laws and parts of laws amendatory thereof.

The bill was read. It provides that the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, and all other laws and parts of laws amendatory of said act and supplemental thereunto, and all amendments thereto, be, and the same hereby are, repealed.

The second section provides that all suits and proceedings now pending in the courts of the United States wherein an adjudication in bankruptcy has been made shall be proceeded with and governed by the provisions of existing laws, which are hereby continued in force only for the purpose of closing up suits and proceedings now pending.

The third section provides that this act shall take effect from and after the 1st day of April, 1876.

The amendment reported by the committee is as follows:

Strike out the words "April, 1876," and insert in lieu thereof "January, 1877."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LYNDE. I call the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. LYNDE. I will yield to the gentleman for a suggestion.

Mr. LAWRENCE. This bill, if I understood it correctly from the reading at the desk, provides for the repeal of the bankrupt act by its title. It will be remembered that that law was embodied in the Revised Statutes, and I doubt if the bill is passed in this form it would accomplish the purpose designed. The clauses of the Revised Statutes relating to bankruptcy should be definitely repealed; otherwise those sections might continue in force if the bill is left in its present condition.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the bill will be reported again. The objection urged by the gentleman from Ohio has undoubtedly been considered by the Committee on the Judiciary. But it seems to me that the bill as it now stands repeals the bankrupt law and all laws touching the subject.

The bill was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. If there can be any question of this language being explicit enough to repeal the bankrupt law, I would suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] that the first section be amended by inserting after the words, "amendments thereto" these words, "and all laws and parts of laws on the subject of bankruptcy embraced in the Revised Statutes of the United States under the title of 'bankruptcy' and all acts amendatory thereof;" so that the section will then read:

That the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, and all other laws and parts of laws amendatory of said act and supplemental thereunto, and all amendments thereto, and all laws and parts of laws on the subject of bankruptcy embraced in the Revised Statutes of the United States under the title of "bankruptcy" and all acts amendatory thereof, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. LYNDE. I would be very glad to accept the amendment of the gentleman, but this is a report from a committee.

The SPEAKER. The bill is amendatory at this stage only by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in the first section the words I have suggested.

Mr. KASSON. That would repeal all the laws upon the subject of bankruptcy, and I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. The purpose of the bill is to repeal the whole legislation upon bankruptcy.

Mr. FORT. Let us take what we can get; a part is better than nothing at all.

Mr. STOWELL. I object also to any amendment at this time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill as amended.

Mr. RANDALL. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 186, nays 58, not voting 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Ainsworth, Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, George A. Bagley, John H. Bagley, jr., John H. Baker, William H. Baker, Banning, Bass, Beebe, Bell, Blackburn, Bland, Boone, Bradford, Bradley, Bright, John Young Brown, William R. Brown, Buckner, Horatio C. Burchard, Samuel D. Burchard, Burleigh, John H. Wiley Wells, Whitthorne, Wigginton, James Williams, Wilshire, and Woodworth—45.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. LYNDE. I ask unanimous consent of the House to correct a clerical error in the first section, in order to make it conform to the statement in the title of the bill. The first section of the bill as printed contains these words "approved March 2, 1867." It should be March 21, 1867, and I ask consent that that correction be made.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the error will be corrected.

Mr. KASSON. Will the effect of that correction be to make the bill perfect and effective which is now imperfect and ineffective?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposed amendment?

Mr. KASSON. I object if that is the case, for this bill, if it should pass and become effective, will place all the debtors of the country at the mercy of the creditors.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the correction is not now in order.

Mr. LYNDE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. HOSKINS in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] is first entitled to the floor upon this bill.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Chairman, some remarks that fell from the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] who has charge of this bill, and some of the statements which were made yesterday by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] incline me to ask the attention of the committee for a short time.

I concede that an appropriation bill should undergo a severe examination. I think it is the duty of the House to bring each appropriation bill to the lowest limit consistent with the honor and prosperity of the country. I concede, moreover, that the democratic majority in this House has the right to seek the largest possible reduction. But I deny to that majority, the right and privilege to reach that reduction by a disregard of the honor, dignity and prosperity of the Republic.

I am opposed to the retrenchments embraced in this bill; and yet I do not indicate by anything that I may say upon this bill that I shall be opposed to reductions which may be found in other bills; for I do believe, as I have believed in former sessions, that reductions were and are possible, reductions which would be for the good of the country and result in a large saving to the Treasury.

The remark of the gentleman from Mississippi, to which I first allude, the utterance of which especially attracted my attention, was that "when we came here at the commencement of this session we found an exhausted Treasury." I do not believe that it is the privilege of any man, either of the majority or the minority in this House, in a discussion of a question of this nature, the discussion of which will not and cannot be confined to the limits of our own country, but must make its way to all the countries whither we send our ministers and our consuls, to stand up here and represent that we have to-day an exhausted Treasury, and that therefore it is necessary to make this reduction.

Mr. Chairman, while our financial matters may not be precisely what we would have them in many respects; while our circulating currency—our paper money—may be at less than par, yet it is a matter of satisfaction and pride that, after we have passed through such a war and expended such vast sums of money, we were officially informed at the commencement of this very Congress that we have in the Treasury of the United States $125,000,000, wherewith to respond to any and every demand which may be made upon that Treasury. Yet the gentleman representing the Committee on Appropriations stands here in his place and says that we came here to find an exhausted Treasury.

There was a time when we had an exhausted Treasury. It was in 1861, when the party now in power in this Government took possession of it. When Mr. Buchanan went out of power we had indeed and in truth, an exhausted Treasury; worse than that, we had not only an exhausted Treasury, but we had lost credit at home and abroad. As was said here the other day in debate, we were unable to secure a small loan, although offering therefor the high rate of 12 per cent. interest. An exhausted Treasury and a damaged public credit were what we inherited as a party when we came into power.

I therefore repel here the declaration that we have an exhausted Treasury, and are under the necessity of reducing the pay of our foreign ministers, and of dismissing our consuls because we have not the ability to pay them. Having called the attention of the gentleman and of the House to this point, I will pass on.

The appropriation bill now pending, is of a kind that I suppose we are to receive from the Committee on Appropriations, affecting all the other Departments of the Government. I understand that it is the determination that all our appropriation bills shall seek a larger or smaller reduction. It is understood by the House and by the country that there is distinctly an objective point in this procedure: a reduction with a view to the campaign that is upon us. Irrespective of the wants of the Government, a reduction is to be made, arbitrarily and by force of numbers, disregarding the honor and prosperity of the country.

I said a moment ago, sir, that I did not believe we could reduce our diplomatic expenses without bringing upon ourselves dishonor abroad. There are those who fancy that our ministers abroad are over paid. I hold here in my hand an extract written by an American traveler in Paris; and he commenced by saying that Paris furnishes strange contrasts. He walked down one of the streets and passed the English embassy, a house built by the British government, where Lord Lyons resides. What is the pay of Lord Lyons? Fifty thousand dollars a year, with contingent expenses. The traveler passes on and is compelled to turn into a side street, go up three flights of stairs, and there find the American minister living upon a compensation of $17,500. And now we are told that it is necessary to reduce his compensation to $14,000!

Mr. Washburne is the peer of Lord Lyons. I am not saying that we are to have our representatives abroad bedecked in the tinselry of monarchical representatives. I do, however, insist that the representative of this proud Republic at the court of Saint James, at Paris, or elsewhere, shall not be compelled to wind his way through those cities with his head bowed down with shame at the failure of his Government to have himself properly cared for at the seat of his dignified and important labors.

It is true that in regard to many of our important missions to-day, the poor men cannot well afford to accept them. It is said publicly, that only such and such a man, because of his great wealth, can represent the country at this and that court. I insist that it is not for the interest of the Republic that we should be compelled to pass by, perchance, the man of no fortune and find the man of large fortune. We are not compelled thus to limit ourselves in seeking out and obtaining the greatest public integrity, the highest virtue, and the largest possible talent that we can employ.

I will now allude to a single other remark made by the gentleman from Mississippi, who has this bill in charge. He says that we are called upon to pass this bill in order that we may set our faces against present wasteful extravagance. The present pay of our foreign ministers is precisely what a democratic Congress and a democratic administration made it. We have not appropriated a dollar beyond what the democratic administration of Mr. Buchanan led us to appropriate for ministers and consuls at that day. If it was not wasteful extravagance under Pierce's and Buchanan's administration, wherefore does it become wasteful extravagance under a republican administration? Our foreign intercourse last year cost us only $1,165,418.23. Has that amount ever been exceeded? In turning back, in the finance report which I hold in my hand I find that in 1853 and 1854 our foreign intercourse cost us $7,763,812.41; and in the succeeding democratic administration, in 1855 and 1856, our foreign intercourse cost us $3,642,615.39. We have already reached a limit far below the average sum which was expended by the preceding administrations of Mr. Pierce and Mr. Buchanan. It was not wasteful extravagance then. How is it wasteful extravagance now?

Although our foreign ministers, as I insist, are even now poorly paid, we are now told, and for the first time in these twenty-three years, that we have overpaid these men who represent us abroad. If gentlemen will look at the table furnished by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] yesterday, as part of his very able and convincing argument, it will be seen there, along with Great Britain, with France, and with Germany, in a column which tells the amount paid to ministers and consuls, that in almost every instance the American Republic stands at the foot of the list, with her ministers and consuls the most poorly paid and the most scantily furnished. Yet they are representatives of a republic more grand, more powerful, with a sublimer and grander history than either of the other countries. Yet, sir, our ministers, with $125,000,000 in the Treasury, are to be told, not for any good reason, but only for campaign purposes, simply that and nothing more, that their pay is to be cut down. Forty-four consuls are to be set adrift and American commerce is to be allowed to dwindle still more, to be neglected in the portions of the world where we have been fostering it carefully and sedulously now these many years. Just as we are about to realize largely from that fostering care, the Government proposes to draw off these five ministers and forty-four consuls.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to a remark made by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] It is a remark which has fallen from his lips more than once, as well as from other gentlemen, as though it was really worthy of consideration, and therefore could bear repetition. It is this: we are asked to compare the net ordinary expenditures of the Government in 1860 and the net ordinary expenditures of the Government in 1875. We are asked to do that as though there were no existing reasons why our current expenses now should not necessarily far exceed those of 1860. We are told here on this floor that we have grown extravagant because our expenses are now more than they were then. Nothing is said about the great events which have transpired during the intervening period. No intimation is made of the waste and wreck of the great civil war. No allusion is made to the pension list, which has grown to $29,000,000. Not the slightest reference is made to any of the elements going to make up that difference in expenditures. They are all passed over in silence. Now, it might do for some demagogue, addressing a crowd of ignorant people in some retired place, but it is not manly debate, it is not fair discussion, it is not an honorable way to consider a public question which takes hold of the honor and vitality of the Republic, thus to allude to the difference of expenditures then and now.

The other day in debate, a gentleman called attention to the expenses of Mr. Jackson's administration. Another alluded to the smallness of expenditure during the administration of John Quincy Adams. The pension appropriation bill passed this year is twice as large as the expenditures of Mr. Adams's administration during any one year. We have expenditures now unthought of, undreamed of, at that day; and yet some people seem to fancy it is because we have become wasteful that we are now compelled necessarily to appropriate these large sums of money.

It would be very easy, Mr. Chairman, to fill up the differences between the expenses of 1860 and those of 1875. We could fill up the space with but little difficulty. I have already thrown out one item, that of $29,000,000 appropriated to pay the pension list. In addition, we know that the expenses of the War and Navy Departments have been doubled. We know that there is not a branch or a Bureau of this Government that has not had its expenditures swollen, as the result of the civil war. When Hon. Ezra B. French became Second Auditor, he found in that Office twenty-one men as clerks, and they all came into a little room to congratulate him. Since then he has had four hundred and eighty-five clerks at one time, now one hundred and seventy-five. In the Pension Office then there were but twenty clerks, and then fifty, owing to the bounty-land bill, while since then there have been four hundred and twenty-five; now three hundred and eighty-five. In the different Comptrollers' and Auditors' Offices of the Treasury Department, in the Adjutant-General's, Surgeon-General's, and other Offices of the War Department—indeed, in every branch and Bureau of the Government—ten times the force has been required since 1860 as was needed before the war.

New Bureaus have been added, calling for more clerical force than the whole Treasury Department in 1860; the Office of Comptroller of the Currency, calling for an appropriation of half a million of dollars annually, the Bureau of Printing and Engraving, receiving between one and two millions, the Internal Revenue, having last year an appropriation of above five millions, the life-saving service calling for a fourth of a million; but I cannot linger to increase the list. I will just add that it is simply folly to suppose that an expanding and growing Republic of forty millions of people can get along with as little governmental expenditure as one of twenty or thirty millions. Till our vast war debt is paid off and our pension list is exhausted, we cannot hope for figures which shall resemble those of 1860. It is better to be honest with ourselves than to delude the people. Some seem to think that we are wasteful and extravagant because we are meeting these inevitable results of the war.

Now, for one I am willing to admit that there may be a reduction of force in some of the Departments of this Government, and perhaps in all. As one gentleman said, this is a poor place to begin; let us begin with some of these Bureaus here in Washington, where force may have been crowded in more than was absolutely necessary. Let us not strike at the honor of the country, as we do when we strike at our foreign intercourse. Let us not strike at the commerce of the country, as we do when we strike down these men who are sent abroad to gather commercial statistics, to watch for and look after the interests of American seamen. It is poor policy, it is a stingy policy, it is a policy that will never reward the party that seeks to adopt it, and a policy which will damage the country at large.

Mr. Chairman, I desire now to call attention to a remark which was made yesterday by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] and would be glad if he would give me his attention while I allude to it, because I certainly do not wish to do him an injustice; and yet I am very free to admit that he has been led into a very great error and made an unfair representation here to the House. He said yesterday, reading an extract from the Boston Journal of Commerce, that republican America, or the United States, was a more expensive government than monarchical England; yes, that it was more expensive to the tune of $125,000,000 a year.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota misunderstands me on that point. In my remarks yesterday, I called attention—and if the gentleman will look at them he will see that I did so—to the extraordinary statement published in the Boston Journal of Commerce on that subject. And I said that I indulged the hope, as the gentleman will see by looking at my remarks, that the allegations there were overstated. I simply wished to call attention to the fact that at least it was asserted upon the part of a Scotch paper that the expenses of our Government exceeded the expenses of that of Great Britain. I did not have occasion to say, nor did I think the statement was itself well founded, although the gentleman will perceive that the statement I also referred to, taken from the Boston paper, would show that the local and Federal expenses of the Government would exceed the sum mentioned by the Scotsman, which is copied by the Boston Journal. The gentleman could not certainly have understood me as affirming that that statement was correct.

Mr. DUNNELL. I am glad that the gentleman withdraws the statement which he made yesterday.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not withdraw a word of it. If the gentleman will look at my remarks he will find that I am stating now just what I stated yesterday.

Mr. DUNNELL. I quote from the gentleman's remarks of yesterday:

"Thus," says that journal, "it unhappily appears that our Federal and local expenditures exceed the corresponding expenditures of Great Britain $125,000,000 a year." I am glad that the Scotsman somewhat overestimates our expenditures, but still it is in fact so great, and the tendency and motives to increase the volume are so fearfully pressing and growing year after year, that the friends of free government may well take the alarm.

Now, sir, the gentleman left the impression upon my mind, as I think he left it upon the House, that our expenses exceeded the expenses of the British government. I hold in my hand a book in which I find the expenses and the receipts of the English government for 1874 and 1875. In round numbers, the receipts of the home government are put down at £73,000,000 sterling; the expenses of the home government at £73,000,000 sterling. The receipts of local administrations amount to £38,000,000 sterling, and the expenses nearly to same sum. Now it will be seen that the receipts of the whole empire are seventy-three millions plus thirty-eight millions, making £111,000,000 sterling, or $550,000,000. Also the expenses of the British government are given to us as £111,0000,000 sterling, or $550,000,000, ascertained directly from the best authority in the world. And, by the by, I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that I propose to answer his remarks about what he calls local taxation. This is the expense, $550,000,000, which it costs the British government to conduct its great affairs. We appropriated $271,000,000, and out of that come $100,000,000 interest upon the national debt, to say nothing about the pension item and the other items to which I have referred. I am unwilling that an American Representative shall stand here in this House and proclaim to the world that republican America is more expensive than monarchical England. It is not true. This book shows a double expenditure on the part of England.

Now, sir, where the gentleman allowed himself to be misled is when he undertook to talk about local taxes. The English government furnishes no data as to local taxation, except so far as it refers to Scotland, Ireland, and Wales; and it is there called local taxation, and what misled the gentleman was in calling that taxation local which is just such taxation as we subject ourselves to when we appropriate money to support the Territories. But the gentleman from Indiana dragged in what is known here at home as local taxation. What is local taxation here at home? It is State taxation; it is county taxation, city taxation, town taxation, school-district taxation. And the gentleman gets up some figures and shows some $700,000,000 of local taxation in the United States and then compares that $700,000,000 with this aggregate of governmental expenditures on the part of Great Britain.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend must notice that I did not get up any figures at all. I was simply calling attention to the assertions of the press of America with reference to the comparison between our taxation and that abroad; and I may say that I have seen figures somewhat different from those the gentleman from Minnesota has presented. The object of the Scotch paper quoted by the Boston Journal of Commerce was manifestly to group together all the local and Federal taxation of this country, and compare it with the local and national taxation of England. But I did not get up any figures at all. I simply reported what was said in the public journals of America.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact that local taxation was brought in here and the gentleman brought it in considering the expenses of our Government and the government of Great Britain. Now local taxation, as we understand it in America, has no place here on this floor. This House has nothing to do with the discussion of such a question. Whether the great State of New York be building a State-house costing $7,000,000 or the great State of Illinois one costing $5,000,000, whether the great States of this Republic are expending large sums of money in building State-houses or whether counties are building court-houses and jails, or whether our cities are building school-houses and constructing bridges, and developing this young Republic, has nothing whatever to do here. This matter of local taxation is something entirely outside of Congress and ought not, and cannot properly, be dragged in here in instituting a comparison between our expenditures and the expenditures of any other government on the face of the globe. It must be remembered also here, in discussing local taxation, that we are not in the same condition as England, thank heaven; we are not old. We are a young nation; and to suppose that we can get along with an expenditure in local matters as cheaply as can older countries, is not supposable. We are in the formative period of our existence; we are growing. We are expending money, not simply for the present but for the grand future, and if the American people under local laws see fit to go into local expenditures they understand what the reasons are, requiring them to do it, and they are alone responsible for them and must bear the burdens they impose upon themselves.

Sir, it is not fitting to bring into the House of Representatives this discriminating and unfair comparison between our Government and the government of Great Britain. Our expenses are far less than those of foreign governments of the same importance. Every intelligent reader of history the world over knows that fact, and here I protest against the declaration that we have an exhausted Treasury, or that we are compelled to dishonor ourselves at home and abroad, or that as a Republic we are to admit the truthfulness of any comparison as between our expenditures and those of monarchical governments which place ours in advance of theirs.

Everybody knows that official salaries all through the country are vastly below the salaries paid under monarchical governments. We have no high salaries in America. We have none under the Federal Government; we have no high salaries. Sir, I am not advocating high salaries, but I insist that the salaries we give to our foreign ministers to-day are no more than they ought to have in order that they may live respectably and without a sense of home neglect, and continue in the discharge of their great duties as American ministers wherever they may be.

I promised not to detain the committee, and I shall reach a conclusion very soon. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] said yesterday that we need not ministers but consuls. Now, I will admit that in some localities a consul might be more serviceable to the Government and to the commerce of the country than a minister; and yet I do not believe that any fair-minded man could have heard the speech of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] without being compelled to give assent, not only to his propositions, but to the conclusions to which he came. It was, sir, a manly, noble, statesman-like speech. And here let me add what I was about to say. How comes it that these gentlemen in getting up this bill have discharged forty-four consuls if they are thus more valuable than ministers? Why is it that forty-four consuls have been stricken from the list, and in many instances where those consuls are just now needed to bring to the Government the fruits of its long-continued efforts made to secure a successful commerce with those countries. The English government has to-day, in every known port of the world, a consul; it is known, it is a matter of history, that the commerce of England is as extensive as the representation of England.

You may go into any port in the world, and you will find at once an English consul there and you will find the English flag afloat. You will find also in very many of the ports, indeed in all the large ports of the world, that an English consul is awaiting the arrival of an English steamer to carry off the products of the country. It was my fortune to spend one year in the republic of Mexico. I went there, and was compelled to go there, on an English steamer, subsidized by the English government and under an English flag. When I reached the port of Vera Cruz, where I landed, I found there an English consul and a vice-consul and a clerk; I was there in the presence of the representatives of the English government. I was carried there on an English steamer. Upon the wharf I found the products of Mexico, and they were soon taken into the steamer and she took them away. They were products that ought to have come to our markets, products that we ourselves should have fostered and taken care of. But we had no steamer there to take them away.

It is now proposed to cut down the pay of the consul at that port. Within the last twelve years, we have had there as consul an American merchant from the city of Brooklyn, who had so well watched the commercial interests of the United States at that port that fortunately we now have a steamer once a month going into that harbor.

But there is to-day not a considerable port in Mexico into which an English steamer does not go. At Acapulco, Tehuantepec, Vera Cruz, Tampico, Matamoras, into every port of the Mexican Republic, there goes first an English consul, and then English steamships go there and carry away the products of that country.

Sir, we are not half liberal enough in our legislation for American interests. There are men who have been frightened to death by the word "subsidy." The gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] who told us in reply to a question from the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] that he had certain schemes in his own mind, some of which were good, yet he was so terribly alarmed at the idea of governmental aid for anything that he voted for the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] against granting subsidies to any conceivable object. He voted for that resolution, and yet tells the House and the country that he has a number of these schemes on hand which he proposes to vote for. Then why did he not stand up here and vote "no" upon that resolution, and let that class of resolutions be treated here as they ought always to be? I voted against that resolution. I do not propose to vote for any subsidy which my constituents will not sustain me in voting for. But I will never put a cord about my tongue; I will not vote a gag upon my tongue nor a gag upon this House.

We are told that we must pass this appropriation bill because the people are burdened with taxation and because we must relieve the people from that burden of taxation. What are our taxes? We understand what they are; they are indirect, both the internal revenue and the imposts. Suppose the present tariff remains unchanged, what are these poor tax-burdened people to get out of this reduction? They are to get this, that we have paid off that much of the national debt; that our receipts have enabled us to reduce the national debt. What a grand relief that will be to these tax-burdened people! The reduction of the national debt is worthy, but that will not relieve the people. They will rather at this time desire a relief from the burdens of taxation than a reduction of the debt.

It may be said, however, that we propose to remodel and revise the tariff. After I have made a few remarks upon that subject I will close. It is said that we are to have less expenses, and I presume it is intended that we shall have less receipts, because if we do not have less receipts then I ask the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, [Mr. COX,] how will we relieve the burdens of the people? I understand we are to have less receipts, and I hold in my hand a copy of the proposed tariff bill. That tariff bill has some funny things in it. If it passes I shall have a first-rate campaign document for next summer and fall. I would not want a better one than this tariff bill which the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, [Mr. MORRISON,] has introduced.

When I go to my constituency and say to them, "Gentlemen, we have reduced the expenses of the Government," they will say to me, "That is all very well; but have you reduced this indirect taxation?" Of course I will answer, "O, yes; we did reduce it." They will ask me how, and I will tell them the simple story how we did it—the democratic House, I mean, for it will not have my vote. I will tell them that we have cut down the tariff on silks and silk dress-goods from 60 per cent. ad valorem to 40 per cent. ad valorem. They will sit in silence, but will ponder in their minds how that tallies with the theory that the luxuries of life shall pay the higher duties.

Then I will further tell them that in order to make things level, we imposed upon their tea and coffee a taxation equivalent to fifteen or twenty millions of dollars a year. Now, I very respectfully say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] that I want no better campaign document than that. If that is the result of this much-proclaimed economy, my constituents will say "Away with it; we have had enough of it." I hope to see this tariff bill brought before the House, and I want some one to demonstrate, if he can, how the price of tea and coffee will not be affected when you impose upon coffee a duty of five cents per pound and upon tea a duty of fifteen cents per pound. I shall have my ears open and my mind directed to the subject; I will drink in from the lips of the eloquent gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] what he may say. I will endeavor to be converted, but I fancy I shall not be.

In conclusion, let me say this: The present appropriation bill is unworthy of this House in that it strikes at American commerce, and at American honor. I hope there are more than one upon the other side of the House who will stand to the precedents of the democratic party and insist that we shall give to our present ministers what we gave to the ministers who were sent out by Mr. Pierce and Mr. Buchanan. We are not bankrupt; we have the ability to do it; we are rich indeed in yet undeveloped power. Let us not, therefore, bring dishonor and damage to the Republic.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I would not detain the committee with any remarks upon this bill if I were not convinced by the examination which, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, it has been my duty to make that serious if not irreparable injury would be done to the commercial interests of the country, and more particularly to those of the city of New York, unless some of its omissions are supplied by judicious amendments, which can only follow full discussion of its provisions. In saying this I do not necessarily imply any censure upon the committee, who, charged with the duty of reporting the vast and complicated expenditures of the Government, cannot be expected to do more than present a frame-work upon which the experience and the suggestions of the individual members of the House shall build the complete structure. Moreover, in reference to the commercial interests of the country the committee are entitled to great indulgence, because it so happens that there is no member of it who represents a constituency largely engaged in foreign commerce, unless it be its chairman, who, with all his accomplishments, cannot be expected to carry the whole fabric of our national interests upon his Atlantean shoulders. The errors and omissions which it is my duty, not altogether agreeable, to point out, would, I am sure, have been avoided, as they will be cheerfully corrected, with a better knowledge of the facts to which I shall ask your attention.

RETRENCHMENT.

In what has been said in regard to the necessity of retrenchment in the public expenditures I am in entire sympathy with the members of the committee, and no one will go farther with them in the direction of real and thorough reform; but I am sure that it will not be necessary to remind the committee that statesmanship does not consist in retrenchment only; that enonomy may easily be carried within the limits of parsimony, and that reform may be pushed beyond the limits of prudence and justice.

DIPLOMATIC SALARIES.

I shall ask them to remember these axioms while I discuss the bearing of this bill upon the commercial interests of the country. I shall have but little occasion to differ with the committee as to that portion of the bill which reduces the compensation of our diplomatic representatives in Europe. In fact, if the committee had gone farther and abolished or consolidated several of these missions they would have had my hearty concurrence. I fully approve of the discontinuance of the mission to Greece, and if that to Switzerland had in like manner been terminated I cannot see that any public interest would suffer. And if the committee had seen fit to withhold appropriations for the payment of the salaries of other ministers whose names have been connected with unpleasant scandals, I should have felt that a patriotic citizen might visit foreign lands with greater satisfaction, and escape the humiliation which, when once felt, will not down until the cause is removed either by retirement or investigation.

I have said that I shall have no difference with the committee in regard to the reduction in the diplomatic salaries. At the same time candor compels me to state that they are certainly inadequate to meet the legitimate expenses of our ministers, under the circumstances and in the style in which they are compelled to live. But this has always been true of our representatives abroad, and yet the positions have been eagerly sought after, and generally filled by gentlemen fully competent to the duties. They offer collateral advantages of such a desirable nature that incumbents of sufficient culture and private means can always be found to take these positions even at considerable cost to themselves. Except, therefore, that the cost of living be generally advanced in Europe of late years, as in this country, the committee might very properly have returned to the rule of compensation which prevailed prior to the war, and the public service would not have been thereby injured.

CONSOLIDATION OF SOUTH AMERICAN MISSIONS.

I find myself, however, unable to agree with the committee in the policy of consolidation adopted in regard to the South American missions. From the best information which I have been able to procure, it will simply be impossible for the ministers so accredited to the combined powers to reside long enough in any one year in one place to acquire that knowledge and social position which are essential for the proper discharge of the duties confided to them. The actual time consumed in traveling often of the most difficult and even dangerous character, will amount to several months in the year, while the expenses of the journey will absorb the greater part of the salary allowed. Practically, therefore, the recommendation of the committee will, if approved, result in the abolition of all but one in each consolidation of missions. The question therefore is whether it is wise to abolish these missions and abandon the policy which for so many years, and with the approval of our wisest and most conservative statesmen, we have pursued in regard to our sister republics of South America. Aside from the commercial interests involved, with which I shall deal hereafter, we occupy a peculiar relation to these republics, so to speak; that of a mother, who is alike an example, a guide, and a protector. They came into life and got their shape and fashion, as the result of our struggle for independence and our success in free government.

In the hour of trouble they have always appealed to us for advice and moral aid, and we are the standing and respected arbiter to whom their differences with each other and the governments of the Old World are constantly submitted. They cherish a romantic attachment to our Government and our people which is perhaps at variance with the cold maxims of political philosophy, but which touches the springs of the human heart and commends itself to the "plain common sense" of the American people, in whom I am glad to say the "touch of human nature which makes the world akin" is not yet extinguished. Shall we do aught to repress the flame of liberty which, now burning so feebly, will surely, if fed by our own experience, encouragement, and friendly counsels, grow into a brilliant illumination, spreading over the whole South American continent and lighting up the homes of millions of happy and industrious freemen, whose sympathies and business will be mainly with us, who have been their friends and their exemplars?

STATISTICS OF SOUTH AMERICAN COMMERCE.

I apologize, Mr. Chairman, as a man of business, for indulging in what may be characterized as mere sentiment, but I feel that if it be sentiment, it is "bread cast upon the waters," which will after many days return an abundant harvest. A few figures will substantiate this assertion. From the Government returns, I find that our business with these countries in 1874 was as follows:

Countries.	Imports.	Exports.	Total.
Peru	$1,256,286	$2,518,404	$3,774,680
Ecuador	2,896,012	1,380,515	4,276,527
Colombia	7,749,433	5,123,845	12,873,278
Argentine Republic	4,537,670	2,478,513	7,016,183
Paraguay and Uraguay	2,515,563	1,115,042	3,630,605
Chili and Bolivia	666,560	2,730,617	3,397,177

COMPARED WITH EUROPEAN COMMERCE.

Comparing these figures with our trade with some European countries with which the committee deem it wise to maintain direct diplomatic relations, we can find no valid reason for abolishing these South American missions except that of Bolivia.

Countries.	Imports.	Exports.	Total.
Austria	$488,642	$1,682,249	$2,170,891
Portugal	577,742	1,768,335	2,346,077
Denmark	485,508	2,430,791	2,916,299
Sweden and Norway	2,037,914	2,385,088	4,423,002
Turkey	786,877	2,549,493	3,336,370

A proposition, therefore, to abolish the mission to Portugal, and to consolidate the mission to Denmark with that of Sweden and Norway, and to consolidate the mission to Turkey with that to Austria, would be quite as reasonable on the score of business relations, and far more reasonable on the score of accessibility, than the consolidation of these South American missions; and of the two alternatives I should greatly prefer the consolidation of the European missions: first, because of the peculiar sympathy in political views existing between us and our South American allies; second, because they offer to us virgin markets and unlimited possibility of trade for the future; third, because we have but little to expect from our European allies, either in the way of political progress or the extension of business, the channels of which are fully occupied by rivals older in the race and better equipped for success.

I am therefore driven to dissent from the committee in all their recommendations for the consolidation of the South American missions, except that of Bolivia with Chili; but in this case the House must understand that it will amount to a practical abandonment of the mission to that isolated republic. If in the judgment of the House the condition of the Treasury and of the country demands the saving of the money expended in maintaining the South American missions now independent of each other, then I am equally clear that it will be better to effect the economy by dispensing with some of the lesser European missions, which are more expensive and less fruitful to the business of the country. No American sympathies, no time-honored traditions founded on the fellowship of freedom, on geographical contiguity, on convictions of the future greatness of the Western Hemisphere, will thus be violated, while commercial relations with our sister-republics, already so important and of such large promise in the future, will be preserved, fostered, and steadily enlarged.

CONSULAR SYSTEM.

But it is in reference to the consular system as affected by the provisions of this bill that I find the most serious grounds of difference with the committee.

STATISTICS.

The total number of consulates maintained by the United States at this time is two hundred and seventy-seven. Of these the bill proposes to abolish forty-four, being about 15 per cent. of the whole number. Now, the consular service of all civilized countries is the outgrowth of the necessities of trade and commerce, and the sound policy of their maintenance is no longer an open question. It is admitted that where a country has no consuls it can have no trade, and the trade is developed and increases just in proportion as its consular service is effective. The rule with all enlightened governments has been to establish and maintain consulates not merely where they have an existing trade, but wherever there is a reasonable prospect of either developing a possible interchange of commodities or of getting a share of the trade already enjoyed by other nations.

POLICY OF GREAT BRITAIN.

The policy of the government of Great Britain has in this respect been most persistent and admirable, and attended with the most surprising results. She maintains in all two hundred and seventy-three consulates, of which all but eleven are outside of the United States. We maintain in all two hundred and seventy-seven, of which seventy-two are in the British dominions; leaving to us two hundred and five consulates in the rest of the world against two hundred and sixty-two maintained by Great Britain. The bill proposes to drop thirty-six consulates not in the British dominions, leaving us with one hundred and seventy-nine consulates against two hundred and sixty-two maintained by Great Britain in the countries with which we compete with that country for trade. Of course the result is obvious, that so far as the business controlled by eighty-three consulates, nearly one-half of our whole number outside of the British possessions, we give up the struggle and abandon the business to Great Britain. Before this serious and possibly fatal step is taken, it will be well to take pause, and examine the relative position of the United States and Great Britain in reference to foreign commerce.

COMPARISON OF BRITISH AND AMERICAN TRADE.

In 1874 the aggregate imports and exports of Great Britain amounted to £667,733,165. Her population was 32,412,010. Her foreign trade, therefore, was at the rate of £21 or $100 in gold per head of population. In the same year the aggregate imports and exports of the United States amounted to $1,265,719,964, which, allowing a population of 40,000,000, gives a foreign trade of $30.66⅔ per head, or less than one-third of the British per capita rate. Those who know the natural resources of this country will not require to be told that we have a better basis for foreign commerce than Great Britain, and that if she can maintain a trade of $100 per capita, we shall surely arrive at the same result if we take the same means to secure it, and remove all artificial impediments from its growth. The figures may be bewildering, but they may be realized, and would amount to $4,000,000,000 per annum. The foreign trade of Great Britain already exceeds $3,000,000,000. Few persons, however, realize the rapid development of our foreign commerce since 1840. Prior to that date its growth was very slow.

1800	83,962,794
1810	103,375,370
1820	108,125,611
1830	115,951,570
1840	202,846,841
1850	300,133,472
1860	708,422,506
1865	640,184,622
1870	875,708,616
1874	1,265,719,964

Those who have been accustomed to talk of the decay of American commerce can study this table with profit. There has in fact been no development in any age or in any country comparable to it. Compare it for example with the increase in Great Britain since 1865, an era of unexampled prosperity:

Year.	Imports.	Exports.	Total.
1865	£271,072,285	£258,831,576	£489,913,861
1870	303,257,493	244,080,577	547,338,070
1874	370,082,701	297,650,464	667,733,165

Between 1865 and 1874 British foreign commerce therefore increased about 40 per cent. while that of the United States increased nearly 100 per cent.

In the face of these figures he must be a bold and a dangerous man who will undertake to circumscribe the area of American commerce by closing up to it a single one of the ports in which it is now carried on and to which it looks for extension.

HEALTHY AND UNHEALTHY TRADE.

But there may be an unhealthy as well as a healthy development of foreign commerce, and in this respect I am sorry to admit that the growth of British commerce is far more satisfactory than our own.

BRITISH AND AMERICAN COMMERCE.

A study of the British table of imports and exports above given demonstrates the remarkably favorable character of her exchanges. As she is always a creditor nation, she paid in the three years quoted, 1865, 1870, and 1874, and the statement is true of all the intermediate years, for the value of imports, by a value of exports far less in amount, on the average over £60,000,000 per annum, which represents the minimum of net annual gain from her foreign trade. Her trade is therefore an eminently healthy and profitable one. With us, we have reason to know that the contrary has of late years been the case, and that we have paid the difference by remittances of national, State, and corporate bonds, estimated by the highest financial authorities to amount to at least $2,000,000,000.

RETURN TO SPECIE PAYMENTS.

To meet the annual interest upon this indebtedness is the burden which weighs us down, and, in the face of our production of the precious metals, is the only real obstacle in the way of an early resumption of specie payments. The remedy is plain, but unpalatable. We must spend less money; less money in carrying on the Government, less money in foreign luxuries in our homes and in the daily walks of life. This money must be devoted to the repurchase of the debt held abroad, until, if not a creditor nation, we shall at least not be called upon for more of the precious metals to meet interest on debt held abroad than we produce at home. But it is of equal importance that that portion of our trade which consists in sending our products into foreign markets should be carefully cultivated, fostered, and encouraged, because in that way and that way only can we pay for the foreign products which we must have as the raw materials in part for our industry. And just here is my grievance with the provisions of the bill under consideration. Instead of enlarging the markets for our products, it actually closes up many of the avenues for their sale, thus increasing the difficulties in the way of return to a system of sound finance—difficulties so great as to demand the highest order of skill and statesmanship for their successful solution.

VOLUME OF COMMERCE MAINTAINED.

In spite of many obstacles, some natural and others artificial, we have succeeded in maintaining a large foreign trade in our manufactured goods, and this trade is, I am glad to say, steadily and surely growing. With the removal of the impediments to this healthy growth, which will be accomplished by some of the ameliorations in the tariff contained in the bill introduced by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and now pending before that committee, and especially by a judicious increase in the free list, this trade will receive an enormous expansion, and without such expansion it is safe to predict that specie payments, even if resumed, could not long be successfully maintained. In the face of this enlightened policy, to which the democratic party is committed by every pledge of honor, by its time-honored traditions, and by every consideration of sound policy, I cannot conceive of any greater mistake than to close up the markets into which these products of our industry, revived as it will be by the removal of the restrictions on production, would otherwise enter and gradually monopolize.

COTTON GOODS.

It is known to all who study the question that our exports of domestic cotton goods are steadily increasing, and in 1875 amounted to 28,817,743 yards, a larger quantity than any year for the past fifteen years.

HARDWARE, ETC.

Our axes, spades, and hoes are steadily driving out the English articles in all the new settlements of the world. Our sewing-machines fairly monopolize the business of the civilized globe, while our agricultural implements have maintained their superiority wherever they have been introduced.

CHILI.

The recent international exhibition in Chili has opened an entirely new field for these products, of which advantage is being taken by our enterprising citizens just as the Committee on Appropriations is preparing to abolish a consulate and to consolidate the mission to that country, to which we sell $2,730,617 of our products and from which we take only $666,560, with that of Peru, to which we sell $2,518,404 and from which we purchase only $1,256,286. The men of business of this country will greatly prefer that the committee should rather direct its attention to the opening of new markets than to the closing of old ones which have been secured by so many years of wise and patient effort.

I might pursue this subject at greater length, but content myself with reciting three instances of the mistakes of this bill, due of course to want of sufficient time to investigate the subject with that care which it deserves.

CHINESE CONSULATES.

The first consulates abolished are Chin-Kiang, Ningpo, and Swatow, in China. Let it be remembered that China is a most important market for our manufactures, in which we have the very best reasons to expect a large and immediate increase of business, especially after the cost of making American printed cotton goods is reduced by the enlargement of the free list in the proposed tariff bill.

I have no means of knowing the reasons which moved the committee to recommend the abolition of these consulates, but I suspect that they examined the register of the State Department and, finding the fees received at Chin-Kiang are reported at $371.84, at Ningpo $574.84, and at Swatow $316.84, concluded that these consulates were dear investments at $3,500 per annum, and therefore concluded to dispense with them. Of course they did not know that by this act they were also practically dispensing with the main interior trade which we do with China. These consulates, and especially Chin-Kiang, which is on the Yang-tse-Kiang, a river with more miles of navigation than the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers combined, are placed at the points where the "transit-pass system" of Chinese trade has been fixed by the Chinese government. All foreign goods are here transferred to and from the boats and steamers which navigate the river or coast along the shores, and no goods can be so transferred without the certificate of a foreign consul resident at these points of transfer. Of course the committee did not know that this trade is mainly in the hands of American citizens, that the steamers which trade on the river are American steamers, owned and navigated by American citizens, who, if these consulates are abolished, must either abandon the business or their nationality. Of course they did not know that Great Britain, hungering for this trade, maintains at Ningpo a consulate at the cost of £1,000 a year, at Kiu-Kiang at the cost of £825, at New-Chwang at the cost of £975, and at Swatow at the cost of £900. Shall it be surrendered to them?

HAYTI.

Again, we have now a minister at Hayti, who is also consul-general and resident at Port au Prince, the principal port of that country. The bill abolishes the legation and with it the consul-general. But we have also in the same country an unimportant consulate at Cape Haytien at a salary of $1,000 a year, which is all that the business of the place will warrant. The committee, doubtless feeling that a country with which we have a commerce amounting in 1874 to $5,835,038, of which $4,265,686 consisted of exports from us to it, and only $1,569,352 consisted of imports from it to us, have reported in favor of doubling the salary of the consul at Cape Haytien, where there is little or no business, and have left us without a commercial representative at Port au Prince, where the main business is done. Of course they will be glad to correct this error.

THE BLACK SEA.

Again, we have but one consulate on the Black Sea, at Odessa. Our trade with the Black Sea amounts to $1,338,030, and is one of the few regions to which we sell more than we buy, our exports being $792,942 against imports to the value of $545,088. No doubt the committee, in ignorance of the value and importance of this trade to the country, especially in view of our critical financial condition, were misled by finding that the fees collected at Odessa amounted to only $189.65.

CONSULAR FEES NO GUIDE.

They do not appear to have known that the fees received are no proper criterion of the volume of business and that a cargo of $1,000,000 may be cleared by a consular certificate costing $2.50. On the question of establishing or of abolishing a consulate the amount of fees received is a minor consideration, as the trade may be of such a nature that a very large volume of business may yield very few fees, or a very small volume of business, but made up of numerous petty invoices, may yield a large amount of fees. The true governing principles are, first, whether the existing business is considerable and, second, what capacities for the development of future business the region may possess. To these considerations the committee do not appear to have given sufficient attention. I forbear, however, to adduce further instances of the neglect of these sound rules of legislation on the consular system, but will, when I move the amendments restoring most of the consulates proposed to be abolished, endeavor to present good reasons for their retention.

CONSULAR AGENCIES.

It has already been intimated by the chairman of the committee that the evils which I predict will not occur, because the State Department may, under the existing statutes, appoint consular agents at these abolished consulates who will attend to the business for the fees. There can be no doubt that the evil may be mitigated in this way, but it will not be cured by the return to an old and vicious system from which we have been for many years trying to extricate ourselves, as manifestly not conducive to the best interests of the country in its trade and foreign commerce. In the first place it is not always possible in these remote and semi-civilized regions, just opening their ports to our trade, to secure the services of American citizens, and it has been found that to place our interests in the hands of foreigners is practically to subordinate them to other and more controlling considerations of nationality. In the next place no commercial house, whether American or foreign, will take an unproductive consular agency except for the collateral advantages of business which it may thus be able to secure. Public interests are thus subordinated to private profit, and that competition which is the life of trade is thus made difficult if not impossible. It is plain, therefore, from past experience as well as from the slightest reflection, that unpaid consular agencies should not be resorted to except in the last emergency.

CONDITION OF THE TREASURY.

But you have been told by the honorable gentleman from Mississippi who has charge of this bill, and doubtless it will be repeated, that the condition of the Treasury and the sufferings of an overtaxed people imperatively demand this retrenchment.

THE CONSULAR SYSTEM SELF-SUPPORTING.

I presume that it is not generally known to the members of this House, although I am bound to believe that the members of the committee were not ignorant of the fact, that the fees received from our consular system are sufficient to defray its entire expense, including salaries, exchange, and all incidental expenses, and to pay over a considerable balance to the Treasury. The people of this country are therefore not taxed one dollar for its direct support, so that instead of cutting off consulates we can and should actually create new ones without burdening the Treasury with a single additional dollar of expense. Prior to 1861, when the consular system was reconstructed, this was not the case. Some consulates were enormously paid by fees, while others received only a scanty pittance, which manifested itself in a languishing trade. By the new and well-considered legislation which required all fees to be paid into the Treasury and moderate salaries paid to the consuls the consular system became self-supporting, and thus gave life to the smaller consulates in remote regions where business was just beginning to spring into existence. The system was never designed to pay a profit into the Treasury, and the people do not desire and will not sustain such a policy.

TRUST FUND.

They expect and prefer that the profits of the system shall be regarded as a trust fund, to be expended in extending the area of trade and in opening new ports to our ships and our merchants.

REDUCTION OF SALARIES.

There is, therefore, no good reason for reducing the compensation of the consuls, unless they are overpaid. But I venture to assert that this is not the case. If they are men fit for their places—and as a rule they are men of large experience, whom adverse circumstances have forced to accept these positions—then the compensation provided by the existing law is as low as they deserve or can afford to take. They are not as a rule so well paid as men of capacity filling positions of equal responsibility in private corporations and in mercantile houses in this country.

DEMAND OF NEW YORK.

The salaries are not so large as I pay to men of equal capacity in my own business, and therefore I deem the reduction as uncalled for by any considerations of expediency or of justice, and I shall vote against it. What my constituents desire is, not that other men shall be deprived of a "fair day's wages for a fair day's work," but that all the avenues of business shall be kept open; that new avenues shall be provided as fast as possible, and, above all, that no blow shall be struck at the commerce of the port of New York, where the suffering is already too hard to be borne with patience, if any movement is made here or elsewhere to obstruct the channels of business.

COMPARISON OF COST OF BRITISH AND AMERICAN CONSULAR SYSTEMS.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, the House should know that we are the only nation whose consular system is thus self-supporting. The amount of fees collected by our consuls in 1874 was $715,202.94. The amount collected by Great Britain in 1872-'73 was £30,282, or about one-fifth of our collections. On the other hand, the salaries paid by the United States in 1874 were $409,000, while the salaries paid by Great Britain were £187,205, or about two and a half times greater than we pay. The incidental expenses for office rent are about in the same proportion, making their loss on the consular business at least $1,000,000 per annum, the bonus which they offer to British merchants to compete with us in the markets of the world. Our merchants ask no such extraneous aid, but they may well demand, and in their name I make the demand, that the money actually collected from them, reducing the profits of their business by just so much, shall be to the last dollar expended in extending and protecting their business. To make any other application of it is not only unjust but unwise. If there be a surplus which cannot be thus expended to advantage the only proper course is to reduce the consular fees, and thus bring nearer to an equality the conditions of the competition with our great commercial rival.

NECESSITY OF ENLARGED FOREIGN MARKETS.

Does the honorable member from Mississippi suppose that the restoration of the Mississippi levees, the throwing out of the jetties at the mouth of the river, and the construction of the Southern Pacific Railroad will provide him with a market for the ten million bales of cotton which he promises as the annual result? Unless the foreign avenues of consumption are enlarged by every possible effort the only effect of his great crop will be to destroy its value and reduce his people to starvation, for he knows very well by bitter experience that they cannot eat their cotton. Does he not know that the capacity for the production of raw material and almost every form of useful manufactured product has reached such proportions in this country that the profits of business have disappeared, and that unless we can get foreign markets for our products we are likely to perish in the midst of our abundance, our very wealth being the cause of our ruin? One of the most intelligent of the workingmen of this country, who has had very extensive opportunities from personal observation of forming a correct judgment, has lately asserted that one-third of the laboring-men of this country are practically in a state of enforced idleness. Does the gentleman from Mississippi expect to set them at work by closing up a portion of the avenues for the distribution of the surplus products of the country in order that he may save the sum of $93,000 in salaries out of a fund expressly raised to keep these avenues open?

The time selected for this innovation is singularly infelicitious. We are just entering on the second century of our existence. After a hundred years devoted to the development of our resources and the opening of our channels of communication—a century in fact of preparation for the supply of the world with the cheap and abundant fruits of our industry—we have succeeded in proving our ability to maintain a position in competition with that great power which has absorbed so much of the commerce and the capital of the world; we have arrived at that point of development in the great staples of industry that we can safely begin to strike away the barriers with which they have been protected. We wisely propose to enlarge the free list of articles essential for the production of the commodities required by our Oriental and South American customers; when, by a proposition which can only be excused on the plea of haste and atoned for by the voluntary amendment of the bill, a deadly blow is aimed at our expanding commerce, at our growing industry, at our commercial ports, and at the welfare of the whole country, against which as a democrat anxious for the reputation and success of the party, as a representative of a commercial constituency whose interests are imperiled, as a patriot proud of the past achievements of my country and confident that the second century of its existence will, unless retarded by unwise legislation surely place it first among the nations in political and commercial importance, I enter an emphatic protest; and especially upon the ground that the fund proposed to be economized is in the nature of a trust fund, raised not by taxes on the people, but imposed upon commerce for the express purpose of its protection and expansion, and therefore in equity applicable only to the objects so essential to the prosperity of the whole people.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I propose to detain the committee but a very few minutes. I had not anticipated addressing the committee in any general remarks upon this bill, though I had expected to say something upon the particular items as they may come up for discussion. I am only induced to speak briefly at this time by the reminder of my colleague [Mr. HEWITT] in his reference to the conduct of our foreign affairs in relation to the continuance of our foreign commerce.

In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, in the consideration of a bill of this character there are but very few propositions to be determined by the House. First, is this a measure looking to the proper, economical administration of the conduct of our foreign affairs? Secondly, in view of our diplomatic and commercial relations with the governments of Europe and elsewhere and in the official representation of our country there, will the measure impair to the least extent either our political or commercial interests? Thirdly, in view of our past and our prospective history, is it wise and politic to make a departure from the well-established and regular order of things? Of course in the few minutes allotted to me I cannot attempt to do more than simply state these propositions, leaving to the intelligence of members of this House the deductions and conclusions to be drawn from them.

I commence at the lower order of our official representation, the consular system of this country. Have gentlemen studied it? Have they looked into its history? Have they searched the records and examined the archives of the Government, so as to know that the consular system of the United States has been brought into existence by the ablest statesman of this country? Of our various Secretaries of State, from the administration of Washington down to that of Lincoln, it may be said, I believe, that they were without exception gentlemen of the highest order of statesmanship—comprehending Thomas Jefferson, John Adams, Daniel Webster—pure-minded men, above the low influences of patronage distributed to oblige partisan followers. They were men who, from a broad, comprehensive, elevated view of the interests of our country, gave to the representation of our Government abroad not only a respectable status, but one looking to the development of our commerce and the protection of our diplomatic and commercial interests.

Our consular system has grown up, not by the enactment of any law of Congress, to meet an emergency in advance of a presidential election. No modification of any of the different consular systems that have existed within my day, covering a third of a century, has been made except upon the recommendation of the State Department—a recommendation founded in every instance upon the commercial necessities at the particular time at which it was adopted.

As our commerce expanded, as our interests were more and more extended in competition with other nations, especially with England, which always rivaled us in the trade with other peoples, under the advice of our State Department we extended our consular agencies. Thus consulships were established and have been maintained. Congress of course fixed by law the compensation of the various consuls; but the representation of our Government abroad was regulated by a broad view of what was desirable for the welfare and interest of our own people.

Therefore, sir, in dealing with the question of consulships, established not for the purpose of diplomacy or the determination of international questions, but looking especially or exclusively after the interests of American commerce, instructing our Government as to the necessities of that commerce and protecting it from foreign encroachment or aggression, I submit with great deference to the able patriotic gentlemen who constitute the Committee on Appropriations that to touch an institution of this character should be a work of great care, of careful examination and thorough deliberation, looking not only to the question of dollars and cents involved in the stipend to be awarded to any particular official, but having regard to the consequences to follow the withdrawal of the officer from any special post.

Sir, this is a commercial country. The greatness and power of this nation have grown up as the result of our foreign commerce. Until within the last few years the whole expenditures of this Government have been maintained exclusively by duties derived from foreign imports; and those imports have come to us by means of our foreign commerce and our foreign commerce alone. From the days of the Continental Congress, down almost to the present moment, direct taxation has been unknown in this country; the entire support of our Government has been derived from foreign commerce. If this has been true in the past, if the commercial advancement of the country has been so essential an element of its prosperity when our great agricultural and mineral resources were as it were undeveloped, and indeed not begun to be developed, how much more is the advancement of our commerce a question of importance with reference to the great future which shall open to us when our vast plains shall be cultivated, when our products shall be a hundred-fold in excess of our power of consumption, when we must find foreign markets for them, when we must reverse the present order of things and bring all Europe and Asia to our feet as debtors to us. Then will our foreign commerce be recognized and appreciated more than I fear it is now by our friends far removed from the seaboard.

We cannot dispense with the carrying trade of this nation. No people can dispense with the means of transit by which they shall be able to dispose of the excess of their own production. This is to be the source of our wealth and power and greatness when in the future, instead of a population of 40,000,000, we shall have two, three, or four hundred million people upon the continent of America. Shall we not want foreign commerce then?

Shall we not want foreign markets then, shall we not want to establish friendly relations with all the people of the world then, when our vast Pacific possessions shall open up to us a trade and commerce twenty times greater than that now enjoyed by us with Europe across the Atlantic?

Sir, let us do nothing to impair, let us do nothing to retard, let us do nothing to injure in any way whatever, the foreign commerce of this country. If this bill saved $20,000,000 to the Treasury, instead of only $400,000, I would not vote for it if by so doing I did anything to lessen the efficiency, derogate from the integrity, or embarrass the progress of our commercial intercourse with nations abroad.

As to our diplomatic I look upon that as secondary to the consular system. You know, sir, in your day and mine the regulation of our foreign affairs has been conducted by our Government at Washington, and not by our diplomatic agents abroad. William L. Marcy, as Secretary of State, was the first to initiate and maintain that all our diplomatic negotiations with foreign powers should be conducted originally from this capital, and not by our embassadors and representatives at foreign courts. Therefore, so far as the representation of our country abroad is concerned, as embodied in our embassadors and ministers-resident, I am not one of those who attach very much importance to the necessity on the part of this Government of their making any great display.

We are told, Mr. Chairman, Americans are traveling constantly, and that it is necessary we should be represented abroad by some competent person who can properly entertain them, but in my opinion this is no important duty, requiring the appropriation of the public money.

I remember, as does my distinguished friend, General BANKS, once chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that we have listened frequently upon this floor to the criticisms of the present American minister at Paris in denouncing as useless and extravagant many of the expenditures for foreign intercourse. That gentleman is now our minister to France, and has been for many years in the enjoyment of the salary. I think I am able to say, without violating any personal confidence, for Mr. Washburne told me, that his salary of $13,500 a year was not more than enough, and that at the end of the year he had nothing out of it to spare. Yet that gentleman while a Representative upon this floor was a most rigid economist. He was the friend of the honorable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and a disciple of the same school of economy.

But let that pass. In my judgment, we should allow our ministers abroad enough for them to be respectable—respectable in the European acceptation of the term, respectable by their exterior presentation at court, respectable by their ability to appear on all public occasions in a proper way. I do not think it is incumbent upon them, in the maintenance of their national and personal character, that they should give large and splendid entertainments. Our Government is not of that sort. Benjamin Franklin, one of our first embassadors, insisted upon presenting himself at court in his Quaker garb, in that plain and simple apparel which he wore upon all occasions. But let us make them respectable. By all means, I wish to impress upon both sides of this House, upon my democratic friends, upon the rigid economists, upon those who wish to curtail expenses—with whom, indeed, I intend to vote for every possible reduction of the profligate expenditures which I think have recently crept into the public service—I wish especially to impress upon the members of this House, on both sides, the necessity for our being exceedingly careful how we do anything to impair the efficiency and integrity of the commerce of this country, as represented by our consular system.

Mr. SPRINGER obtained the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOSKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announcing the proceedings of that body on the death of ORRIS S. FERRY, late a Senator from Connecticut.

DEATH OF THE LATE ORRIS S. FERRY.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the message just received from the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, February 8, 1876.

Resolved, That, as a mark of respect to the memory of ORRIS S. FERRY, late a Senator from Connecticut, the business of this body be now suspended, that his former associates may pay proper tribute to his public and private virtues.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate this resolution to the House of Representatives.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Speaker, the sudden decease of my colleague, [Mr. Starkweather,] who had the matter in charge, and the request of my remaining colleagues have unexpectedly devolved upon me the duty of moving the adoption of the resolutions which have just been transmitted from the Senate and of supporting them by such remarks appropriate to the occasion as I may be able to make; and I regret that I have had neither the time nor opportunity to make a fitting preparation for the discharge of such a delicate and important duty.

Senator FERRY was born at Bethel, in the State of Connecticut, on the 15th day of August, 1823. A portion of his early years was spent in manual labor in the manufactory of his father, but he soon developed such a desire for knowledge and such uncommon indications of intellectual superiority that he laid aside the implements of a trade he was rapidly acquiring and, at the age of fourteen years, entered upon the necessary studies preparatory to admission in Yale College, from which he was graduated at the age of twenty-one. His collegiate career was brilliant, and the high distinction which he afterward attained was clearly foreshadowed at his graduation. He had a peculiar fondness as well as a special aptness for forensic effort, which naturally led him to adopt the profession of the law, and, as a student in the offices and under the personal instruction of two of the most eminent jurists of his native State, he mastered with great facility the intricate science of jurisprudence. He was admitted to the bar in 1846, and immediately commenced a successful practice at Norwalk, Connecticut, which he a few years later allowed to be interrupted by his active participation in the earnest political contest which was then going on. He was at that time an ardent partisan, and was elected to the State senate in 1855 and again in 1856 as a member of the party then known as American. His party was in the ascendency and his talents gave him a conspicuous position among its leaders. As a tactician he was sagacious, and as a debater had all the weapons of logic at his command and wielded them with surprising power. He was independent in thought and positive in action. He shunned all artifice and indirection and fearlessly advocated what he believed to be right, and with equal boldness opposed and unsparingly denounced what he thought to be wrong. It would have violated his nature to have been untrue to his honest convictions, and he was therefore utterly uncompromising between right and wrong.

His fame as a local legislator gave him such prominence that he became a candidate of the republican party for Congress in 1857, but was then unsuccessful. He was again placed in nomination in 1859, and elected to the Thirty-sixth Congress, and in this intellectual arena of the nation, which was at that time throbbing with excitement and numbered among its prominent actors many of the most distinguished minds of the country, he acquitted himself with marked distinction. Among the important positions assigned him in that Congress was a place on the celebrated committee of thirty-three, which was organized to consider the condition and relations of the seceded States.

Upon the breaking out of the late civil war, all the enthusiasm of his nature was aroused for the preservation of the Union, and he entered the army as colonel of the Fifth Regiment of Connecticut Volunteers. On the 17th of March, 1862, he was commissioned a brigadier-general by President Lincoln, and served in that capacity in different divisions of the Army until near the close of the war.

In 1866 he was elected by the Legislature of Connecticut to the Senate of the United States, and was re-elected in 1872. His last public effort there was to pronounce an elegant tribute of respect and affection to the memory of his deceased colleague, Senator Buckingham. With what commanding ability he discharged his duty in that body I need not repeat. It is sufficient to say that by his eminent service he acquired a national reputation as an able, faithful, and conservative Senator, who loved his country more than he loved his party, and in his election honored his State more than it honored him.

As a lawyer he possessed a remarkably clear, discriminating legal mind, which thoroughly understood and intelligently digested the principles of the common law. He was a conscientious adviser, laborious and careful in the preparation of his causes, and skillful in their management, and before either court or jury had not many competitors who could meet him on more than equal terms. In his deportment he maintained the dignity of his profession and cherished its honor with true devotion.

In the later years of his life he was the subject of strong religious convictions, and publicly and with his whole heart professed a belief in the fundamental doctrines of the Christian religion, and made their practice a sincere and constant part of his daily life.

He was a man of unbending integrity and deeply imbued with the true spirit of manhood. He scorned everything that was base and despised everything that was mean. Corruption never tarnished his honor. He had no itching palm for dishonestly-gotten gold, and was at all times above all suspicion of complicity in legislative jobs and subsidies. He received no compensation or emolument except what he was by law clearly entitled to take, and it is the noblest tribute that can be offered to his memory to say that he entered the public service poor and continued many years in the civil and military departments of the Government, and, without extravagance in living, died in his senatorial robes as poor as he entered that service.

He expired at his home on Sunday, the 21st day of November last, after a long and suffering illness. The best medical skill was unavailing to heal his malady and restore his health. The highest type of womanly excellence and devotion existed in his household, and their blessed ministrations, often more potent than the physician's remedies, were, by those every way worthy his companionship, constantly and with cheerful fidelity exerted to the last.

In his death the country has lost one of its purest and ablest statesmen; the Commonwealth of Connecticut, which proudly reckons many distinguished sons among her jewels, the peer of the most gifted of them; the legal profession one of its soundest counselors and most eloquent advocates; the community in which he lived, an accomplished Christian gentleman; and his family such a husband and father as only such a husband could be to a loved and loving wife and such a father to an affectionate and devoted daughter.

It is said, sir, that death loves a shining mark. This cannot well be more strikingly exemplified than in the fact that since the adjournment of the last Congress we have lost an Ex-President, a Vice-President, and a Senator of the United States and six members elected to this House. The State which I have the honor in part to represent has been especially bereaved. Within the short space of less than one year she has been deprived of two Senators: Buckingham, who had rendered most distinguished service and been loved and honored as a State rarely loves and honors a son however eminent, whose decease gave expression to some of the most touching eulogies ever delivered in this Capitol; and FERRY, no less worthy and distinguished, whose private virtues and public services we are now endeavoring to commemorate. Their fame belongs not alone to Connecticut, but to the country; but we cherish with a just State pride the fact that they were born and lived and are buried on our own soil. Their good names are indelibly engraved on the hearts of the people of the State and their graves are shrines which virtue and patriotism and religion will forever venerate. She has also been deprived of a distinguished Representative who has just been borne to his last resting-place in the bosom of her soil and in the presence of his mourning constituency.

The event we are considering is but the reiteration of the solemn and oft-repeated lesson of mortality—another impressive reminder that "man walketh in a vain shadow." Public honors and high position furnish no exemption. The all-wise and almighty Power who decrees the mandate, and the messenger who executes it, respect no distinctions of rank or condition. The mocker at human pride follows man into the high places of the land, and there, as well as in the lowliest, repeats to him the startling message, and the sadness with which its utterance sometimes falls upon our ears cannot be more forcibly illustrated than by a recurrence to the fact that I am now addressing the House in the place of a lamented colleague who but a few days since was in the enjoyment of his accustomed health and had prepared himself for and expected to perform the duty, but has himself been called to his final rest. At the proper time in the course of these proceedings that voice from the dead, speaking in language much more beautiful and eloquent than any I can express, will be read as one of the addresses on this occasion. It will help to remind us that we are constantly living in the shadow of the grave, and, alas! too often allow ambition and covetousness and pride to conceal the shadow or drive it from our thoughts; and to teach us that it will be true wisdom to pause in our career of worldliness and remember there is something within our reach higher than earth's highest honors, which, if attained, will take away the sting of death and crown us with immortal life. In his last years Senator FERRY, trusting in the divine promise, earnestly and humbly sought that happy and exalted end.

I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the House has received with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of ORRIS S. FERRY, late a Senator from the State of Connecticut.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of Mr. FERRY the business of the House be now suspended, that proper tributes may be paid to his public and private virtues.

Mr. SEELYE. Mr. Speaker, I am quite certain that the relations of no other one here with Senator FERRY were the same as my own. The gentleman who has preceded me, and those who are to follow, as also those who listen, knew him only in the varied relations, public and social, of mature life, but he and I were boys together, sharing with one another the gladness of childhood and the aspirations and purposes and hopes of youth. From the little village where his father and mine were near neighbors and friends, and where he and I were playmates and schoolmates, there is no other Representative now here, and it is upon this account that I have been requested to say a few words respecting his early life. It was spent in Bethel, Connecticut, where he was born August 15, 1823. He was a restless, eager, daring boy, not fonder of work than boys usually are, but a leader in all boyish sports, from which no one of his companions was wont to go home with a dirtier face or with hair more tangled and clothes more torn than he. But exuberant as he was of life and vigor, he was neither rough nor rude nor coarse even as a boy. I never knew him, as he grew larger, to tyrannize over smaller boys, though I have often seen him show a sort of chivalric adherence to the weaker side. Generous, high-minded, and a universal favorite, the boy was father of the man.

In school he always had his lessons, though no one ever knew when or where or how he got them; he was not early fond of study, but, if he ever worried his teachers by his restless inattention, he never wearied them by obliging them to repeat their instructions.

If, however, not an early student, he was as a boy a great reader of books, especially in the line of poetry and history and romance, of which his father's library furnished the largest collection then in the village, and from whose stores he was as fond of bringing feasts for the fancy of his boyish friends as they were of feeding upon them. His earliest aspirations were for a literary life; and I doubt if he ever dreamed of his later achievements in the Senate and the administration of public affairs. With unwonted freedom, even for a boy, he told his day-dreams, and the boys who heard them, and over whom his words could throw a spell like that felt by all who listened to him in his riper years, never doubted that they would all come true.

But his lot was cast where other occupations than play or reveling in romances or building castles in the air were soon pressed upon him. In that little village there was no dolce far niente view of life. Everybody had something to do and was expected to do it. Hardly any vice seemed more repugnant to the busy workers there than idleness, and about the most condemning epithet among them which could be applied to man or woman was laziness or shiftlessness. There were no rich people; and had there been, I hardly see how they could have lived a life of leisure without being stung like drones by the busy bees around them. A child's world of fancy there soon found itself intersected by the hard world of fact, and ORRIS FERRY soon learned that the actual present had a work for him no less than the far-off future. While in the dreamy fancies of his childhood there might have been prefigured, had there only been the eye to see the picture, that far-reaching meditativeness in which "the heaven which lay about his infancy" still stretched before the vision of his later years, I think he owed also whatever persistence of purpose and energy of work he afterward revealed as much to these early conditions which surrounded him as to his original endowment. But the fearlessness with which he exercised his purpose, the courage of his convictions, the bravery with which he could throw aside all arbitrary domination and be a freeman and a hero, this was not dependent upon any circumstances of his early life; this was his original possession, as conspicuously his in the earliest revealings of himself as in the latest, and would have been revealed as his wherever he had been born or however bred.

But there were other traits prominent in his later life which were, doubtless, partly due to his early surroundings. The religious faith, which was the ever-brightening crown of his maturest years, was, I cannot but think, greatly aided by the associations of his childhood. In the center of the village where was his childhood's home—central alike in location and in the power it represented—was the Congregational meeting-house, where the only church then in the place gathered with its congregation for public worship, and to which were drawn and from which dispersed the currents by which—as originally was the case in almost every New England town and village—the life of that community was directed and sustained. Hard workers as were the men and women there, sharp, too, at a bargain as they were, and eager to get gain, no one with much knowledge of them but would soon discover that in their thoughts and questionings the next world had no less prominence than this. The warmest discussions ever held among them were on the highest themes of theology, discussions which, however wide their range, were always brought for settlement, in the last appeal, to Scripture and to common sense. It was quite natural that the children breathing such an air should early learn to talk about these things, and to think about them, also, for themselves, and quite to be expected, also, that one like ORRIS FERRY, always unwilling to have his thoughts constrained, and always unable to have them concealed, should in his freedom of inquiry find things where common sense and Scripture seemed to clash, and in his fearlessness of expression should declare this seeming contradiction without proviso. He early avowed his skepticism respecting all religious things, though he always had a certain seriousness of soul which never suffered him to be a scoffer. In later years, when by a further and profounder exercise of this same freedom of inquiry, he became a sincere believer—showing again that it is only the shallow draught at the fountain of free thought which intoxicates and the deep draught which sobers one again—it was not strange that the living faith with which his soul was penetrated should find its fitting expression and liveliest exercise in that form of doctrine and mode of conduct which, though for years repugnant to his convictions and his habits, were yet the earliest, as they were the latest and most intimate, associations of his life.

I do not speak of him as a man, so affectionate, so truthful, so far-sighted, so courageous, with his commanding presence and controlling speech; for as such he has already been and is to be aptly portrayed by those who knew him only as a man. And I trust I shall be pardoned for dwelling at such length upon these thoughts of his boyhood, which make his memory very tender to me and which awaken a sense of personal loss beyond my power to express, as I think of the hopes we both had cherished of reviving here the intimacy of our boyhood and of the expectation which had been to me very bright and dear, that I might find from his superior wisdom and wider knowledge of public affairs a much-needed aid.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have never in this House performed a duty so sad and so sacred as that which is devolved upon me to-day. Two weeks ago last Friday our late beloved friend and associate, Hon. H. H. STARKWEATHER, of Connecticut, came to my seat and urgently requested that I should address the House on the resolutions in reference to the death of Senator FERRY. After speaking with me for a few moments, he was called to the chair to preside and remained there perhaps half an hour; but, not feeling well, he soon passed out, and never entered the Hall again.

The very evening when he was stricken with his mortal disease he had completed or very nearly completed the remarks which he proposed to offer to the House on this occasion. I have not had the heart even to keep my promise to him. I could not think of this subject without being overwhelmed with the sense of the double loss; but I am sure the House will permit me, in place of any remarks of my own, to do what our departed friend can no longer do for himself, to read the speech as he left it. I have filled a few blanks and added here and there a word to supply the final revision which his own hand would have made; and thus the dead speaks for the dead friend whom he soon followed. I read, and ask that it may go into the RECORD as his speech, the following

REMARKS PREPARED BY THE LATE HON. H. H. STARKWEATHER.

Mr. Speaker, since the adjournment of the last Congress, God in His sovereign wisdom has removed from the service of the nation Senator ORRIS S. FERRY, one of its distinguished and trusted councilors.

At any time the death of a Senator in the midst of his labors, so conspicuous for ability, for patriotism, and for a conscientious devotion to duty as was Mr. FERRY, is a great national loss. His departure from us, preceding but a few hours that of Vice-President Wilson, and following so closely that of Sumner and Ex-Senator Buckingham, and others illustrious in the national councils, heightens and emphasizes the bereavement. The death of Mr. FERRY is a peculiar loss to the State that he served and honored, and whose memory she cherishes with an affectionate admiration. Throughout the Commonwealth, among the learned, the founders of our academies, universities, in our common schools, among the ministers of religion, and the humble worshipers of God—along all its hills, in the Sunday-schools that he loved, among learned judges and eminent counselors, among the sons of toil for whom he spoke, among the good and the great, and in every cottage of the poor—there is great sadness.

Twice within a few months death has invaded the sanctuary of our hearts, and taken from us our trusted public servants and most honored citizens. No two men of this generation, among all the honored names of our Commonwealth, could touch so many homes with a sense of personal loss. While their work here is finished, there is left to us the reflection that for this life our pleasant relations are severed forever.

Around us each dissevered chain
In sparkling ruin lies,
And earthly hands can ne'er again
Unite the broken ties.

Mr. FERRY was born in the town of Bethel, in Fairfield County, on the 15th of August, 1823. His father, Starr Ferry, was an enterprising business man of that town—a citizen known for his good sense, integrity, and social position in a community remarkable for its intelligence and culture.

He was early apprenticed to his father's trade, and in after-life he had a just pride of his proficiency in his calling. An incident occurred at the last session of Congress that illustrates his character. As an advocate was explaining before the Committee on Patents the mysteries of a certain invention, he was surprised to learn that the chairman of the committee had learned the art when a boy and was still in advance of the advocates and experts in the thoroughness of his knowledge of the subject. Early, however, the love of books and of study took possession of him and he left his trade to enter on a course of preparation for college. But of this the learned and distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. SEELYE,] the companion of his boyhood, can more appropriately speak. In passing, it is sufficient to remark that as a boy he gave high promise of success.

At the age of seventeen he entered Yale College, and here, says one well qualified to judge—

His fine powers of mind soon found appreciative recognition, particularly in the department of literature and debate. He early became one of the editors of the Yale Literary Magazine; was also a successful competitor for the Townsend literary prize; and uniformly stood among the very highest in anything that required elaborate or extemporaneous address. His prestige thus gained in letters, together with his hearty social qualities, and his fine personal appearance, secured for him a marked popularity as well in circles without as within the college.

He graduated in 1844 at the age of twenty-one, and after a year he entered the office of the late Chief-Justice Thomas B. Butler as a student at law, was soon admitted to the bar, and became his partner.

Here his associations were most fortunate. Judge Butler was remarkable, not only for his legal learning, but for his varied acquirements, his love of justice, and his generous social qualities. Mr. FERRY'S advent to the bar was in other respects fortunate in its surroundings. The bar of Fairfield County and the adjoining counties of New Haven and Litchfield at this time had many eminent lawyers. There were the venerable Charles Hawley, Roger Sherman Baldwin, the Ingersolls, Judges Butler, Seymour, Dutton—all learned in the mysteries of jurisprudence, the first two becoming chief-justices of our high court. Besides these there were a score of younger men, Minor, Beardsley, Loomis, White, Carter, Beach, Harrison, and others, near his own age, of rare ability. At no time in our history has there been a greater array of talent at the bar than this. It is a sufficient commendation of Mr. FERRY, and not a little remarkable, that within a few years from his admission to the bar he placed himself at the head of his profession.

Soon after his admission to the bar Mr. FERRY married the daughter of Governor Bissell, and the daughter and wife, in womanly virtues, in social culture, and in the sweet graces of charity and religion, is worthy of her illustrious father and husband.

When yet a young man he was early honored at home. He was successively chosen judge of probate, State attorney, and State senator. Each of these positions he filled well.

It was my good fortune to be a member of the Legislature of Connecticut in 1856, and to be a member of the judiciary committee of which he was chairman. It was then often a subject of remark among men eminent at the bar that Mr. FERRY, (then but thirty-two,) not only as a debater, but a legislator, had the rarest ability, and at that early day he gave full promise of those great qualities which have for eight years past been the admiration of his colleagues in the Senate. He was then as ever, brave, true, great.

We are greatly indebted to Mr. FERRY for his public addresses before the people of our State. His logic and his eloquence were irresistible on these occasions.

Mr. FERRY was elected to the Thirty-sixth Congress from Connecticut and took his seat in this House in 1859 amid the stirring scenes immediately preceding the rebellion. This body then embraced many men of marked character and ability. Here were the great leaders of the South, men schooled in politics and accustomed to rule; and from the North came also many men of great ability, but mostly new to the public service.

Mr. FERRY from the first took a conspicuous part in the discussions of the House, and was one of the committee of thirty-three appointed by the Speaker on "so much of the President's message as relates to the perilous condition of the country." Early in the debates he delivered a speech which was regarded by his associates as very able and effective, and expressing at that time the true position of its most thoughtful statesmen. His analysis of the state of the country at that trying epoch and his views of the duty of the Government now read like prophecy.

At the close of his two years in the House he raised and commanded a regiment, and served in the Army with honor to the close of the war. His whole heart was in the work; and he devoted his entire time and ability to its duties. When the war was over he resumed his profession; but the next year, 1866, he was elected to the Senate and served a full term, and was re-elected in 1872.

The public career of Mr. FERRY while in the Senate has been so faithfully delineated in the main by his distinguished associates that there is little need to recount them here; and, besides, I feel how inadequate are any words of mine even to express my reverence and admiration.

He entered the Senate at the commencement of the Fortieth Congress. Great questions, among them the problems of reconstruction, were on our hands; with these, new relations of the dominant and the late subject classes as they emerged from a state of war.

I have seen it suggested by those who have failed fully to apprehend the position of Mr. FERRY that he was unduly conservative in his tendencies on questions of reconstruction. On the contrary, it can be said to his credit that on these measures he led the advance. His speeches in the Senate and in the conventions at home show that from the outset he maintained with masterly ability not only the right of the nation, but its duty to secure liberty, enfranchisement, and civil rights to those who had been slaves. It is true, in connection with many leading men of the party, he early favored a large amnesty to those who had been in rebellion against the Government.

But in all his work in the Senate his noble utterances in regard to the power of the nation to suppress rebellion, his denunciations of secession, his appeal for justice for the slave, ally him indissolubly with the great republican leaders whose fame is immortal.

It would be a pleasant service to quote from his speeches and rehearse his acts as proofs, if they were needed, of his fidelity to liberty and his faith in the indestructibility of the Union. There are no nobler acts or utterances on record. But I must not detain the House longer with this sketch while others wait to unfold with better chosen words his character and services.

Before closing, however, let me refer to the crowning glory of his life. Mr. FERRY had a strong religious element in his character. This was with him a great controlling force, and not a sentiment. It added greatly to his strength and upheld him not only in great emergencies but in the daily labors of life. He loved to contemplate and discourse of the Infinite God and the glory of His reign. He dwelt with rapture on the majestic prophecies of Isaiah and the grand poems of the Hebrew minstrel king. His discourses on religion became a part of his beautiful life-work in his home.

It was most beautiful and grand, amid failing strength and long years of pain, to hear him discourse of—

Rest at last,
Repose complete, eternal;
Love, rest, and home.

No cloud obscured the effulgence of his hope or dimmed his vision. Clear and high his intellect and his faith rose above all storms and darkness, and sustained him in sweet companionship amid the unrevealed mysteries of pain. As his end drew near he came back to his home, after a brief absence. There, under his own roof, with the angels of his household about him, he passed to his rest.

Thinking of trials past, and knowing as we do how well he had wrought for the future, trusting in the merits of his dear Lord, he could repeat the sweet lines of Bonar—

Beyond the parting and the meeting
I shall be soon;
Beyond the farewell and the greeting,
Beyond this pulse's fever beating,
I shall be soon.
Love, rest, and home!
Sweet hope!
Lord, tarry not, but come.

Beyond the frost-chain and the fever,
I shall be soon;
Beyond the rock waste and the river,
Beyond the ever and the never,
I shall be soon.
Love, rest, and home!
Sweet hope!
Lord, tarry not, but come.

Ay, the sweeter words of inspiration—in the volume of the book it is written: "Lo, I come quickly. Even so, come, Lord Jesus."

The resolutions offered by Mr. PHELPS were agreed to unanimously.

And then, on motion of Mr. PHELPS, (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

Also, papers relating to the petition of Jackson Roberts, for arrears of pay as a United States officer, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WHITEHOUSE: The petition of Stephen Hull, for an extension of his patent on harvester, to the Committee on Patents.

Also, the petition of citizens of Red Hook, of Greensport, and of Rhinebeck, New York, for the repeal of the stamp tax on safety matches, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS: The petition of Henry Willis and 2,000 citizens of Michigan, for an appropriation for a survey for a ship-canal across the State of Michigan, to the Committee on Commerce.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 9, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, instructing her Senators and Representatives in Congress to oppose so much of the bill introduced by Senator SARGENT in the Senate January 10, 1876, to restore the lands conditionally granted, the conditions of which have lapsed, to the public domain, as will affect grants of lands made to the State of Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, requesting that Congress provide for the organization of a territorial government and the establishment of courts in the Indian Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. BOOTH presented the petition of A. S. Clark and 140 other citizens of Ventura County, California, praying for the resurvey of the Rancho Rio de Santa Clara, now in the county of Ventura, formerly in the county of Santa Barbara; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. WALLACE presented fifty petitions, signed by 5,000 citizens of Pennsylvania, artisans and workers in iron and coal, praying Congress to guarantee the interest on bonds issued by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company; which were referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. ALCORN presented the petition of Sarah T. Jefferies, the widow of Evan S. Jefferies, of Mississippi, praying Congress to pass a law making compensation for certain cotton destroyed; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WHYTE. I present the petition of Samuel H. Kettlewell, of Baltimore, Maryland, engineer, the only surviving professional civilian engaged in the expedition, commenced in 1853 and continued through 1854, set on foot to explore the proposed route for a ship-canal across the Isthmus of Darien from Caledonia Bay to Darien Harbor, by the authorities of the United States, Great Britain, France, and New Grenada.

The petition recites the trials and sufferings, the losses and services of the memorialist, and prays that Congress may pass a law granting him compensation for his said losses and services.

I move that the petition and accompanying printed narrative be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ENGLISH presented three petitions of John P. Phillips and sundry other citizens of New Haven, Connecticut, praying for the issue of 3.65 gold-bearing bonds, the repeal of the act providing for the resumption of specie payments, and that duties on imports be paid in greenbacks at par with gold; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WADLEIGH presented the petition of Abby A. Johnson, widow of Charles Johnson, of Manchester, New Hampshire, asking to be re-instated on the pension-rolls of the United States and for arrearages of pension from September 4, 1871; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition, signed by officers of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, officers' clerks, and other employés in the civil service, praying the passage of a law to the effect that when an officer in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, clerk, or other employé in the civil service of the United States assign his pay, it shall be a part of the duty of the paymaster, disbursing officer, or pay-clerk by whom he is paid, to accept the pay-receipt voucher, duly assigned, when presented, and pay the assignee, when the pay so assigned shall be due; and that all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with this prayer be repealed; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MAXEY presented a petition of 55 citizens of the State of Texas, praying to have refunded to them out of the Treasury the proceeds of the sales of certain cotton alleged to have been illegally seized and taken possession of by United States officials in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Lucy Jane Thomas, widow of Josiah Thomas, praying indemnity for the loss of property belonging to her husband, captured by the rebel cruiser Florida on the high seas in 1863, have had the same under consideration and instructed me to report the same back, asking to be discharged from its further consideration. There is no written report in the case. I desire to say that this is simply a petition without any accompanying evidence. We do not recommend that the claim be disallowed, but ask to be discharged from its further consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will lie on the table, and the committee will be discharged from its further consideration if there be no objection.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the petition and accompanying papers of Wakeman W. Edwards, praying compensation for property taken by the United States military authorities in 1864, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the petition and accompanying papers of James A. Harrold, praying payment for property taken by United States troops during the late war, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of the county officers of Knox County, Nebraska, praying the removal of certain Indians belonging to the Santee Sioux tribe of Indians from that county to the reservation set apart for them by treaty in Dakota Territory, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. CAPERTON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 246) for the relief of Miss Lizzie Dickson, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Fred. A. Holden, praying for remuneration for property destroyed in Ceredo, Wayne County, West Virginia, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 165) for the relief of Michael W. Brock, of Meigs County, Tennessee, late a private in Company D, Tenth Tennessee Volunteers, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 20) for the relief of Hortensia H. Cook, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of James R. Roche, praying extra compensation for services rendered as disbursing clerk in the War Department from July 1, 1871, to March 31, 1875, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Christopher Stucke, praying compensation for certain property taken and destroyed by the United States Army in Ascension Parish, Louisiana, in 1863, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Alexander C. Crawford, of Galveston, Texas, praying compensation for the use and occupancy of his property by the United States forces during the late war, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of George Hibben, for the firm of Hibben & Co., praying to have refunded certain taxes assessed and collected on tobacco wrongfully, as alleged, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the petition of Anna C. Carroll and Martha C. Fitzhugh, praying compensation for their lands occupied by the United States for the Botanical Garden, in the city of Washington, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; which was agreed to.

CANNON FOR SOLDIERS' MONUMENT.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 217) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls to the Ladies' Monumental Association of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, for monumental purposes, to report it without amendment and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of War to deliver, if the same can be done without detriment to the Government, to the Ladies' Monumental Association of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, four condemned cannon and twenty cannon-balls, to be placed on a monument to be erected over the grave of deceased soldiers in the Allegheny cemetery.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

IMPROVEMENT OF CAPITOL GROUNDS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report a bill (S. No. 417) for continuing the work of improving the Capitol grounds, and I ask for its present consideration, for I think there will be no objection to it.

By unanimous consent the bill was read twice and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates $25,000 for continuing the work of the improvement of the Capitol grounds during the present fiscal year.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to say that the appropriation made last year is now exhausted, the work having been done, and it is deemed important by Mr. Olmsted, who has charge of the work, that this appropriation be made in advance of the regular appropriation for the year commencing July 1. I ask that a brief letter from Mr. Olmsted, which I send to the Chair, be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be reported.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, February 8, 1876.

SIR: I beg to call your attention to the fact that the appropriation for the improvement of the Capitol grounds is exhausted, what remains of it being no more than is necessary to meet existing liabilities. In view of the circumstances I would suggest that an appropriation of $25,000 is desirable in advance of the annual appropriation.

First. In order that planting may proceed, it is desirable that all transplanting of trees in the lower grounds should be done early in the spring, not only because a year's time will thus be gained in the growth of the trees, but because if this work is delayed longer it must go over till the fall, and with it the finishing of the grounds in other respects, which would otherwise be proceeded with, must be postponed.

Second. The finishing of the second gradient and of the water-works is immediately desirable. About three-quarters of the work is done.

Third. To permit of the necessary watering, cultivation, and care in all respects of the grounds. If this is neglected until July much may be lost of the value of the works already done.

The probability that the Capitol will be much more visited by strangers next summer than ever before makes it more desirable than it might otherwise be that they should be put and kept in as good order as practicable.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

FREDERICK LAW OLMSTED.

Hon. J. S. MORRILL,
Chairman Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think that letter fully explains the object, and I do not see that there can be any objection to present action on the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. One question only. Does this bill come from a committee?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It is unanimously reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TREASURY ACCOUNTS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a resolution introduced by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] "that the Committee on Finance be directed to investigate the books and accounts of the Treasury Department, particularly with reference to discrepancies and alterations in amounts and figures that have been made in them, especially in the annual statements of the expenditures of the Government, revenue collected, and the public debt contained in said reports; and if any such discrepancies and alterations be found to exist, to report the same and the extent and nature thereof, the years wherein they occur, by what authority made, if any, the reasons that induced them, and to report generally such other and further information bearing upon the subject as to them may seem best, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers," to report it back with a substitute; and if there be no objection, it may as well be acted upon now. It is a resolution of inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be reported, subject to objection.

The CHIEF CLERK. The committee report to strike out all after the word "resolved" in the resolution, and insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, directed to furnish the Senate, as soon as practicable, a statement of all balances due to the United States from public officers, and all such balances due from other parties no longer in the public service, distinguishing those whose accounts with the United States have been finally passed upon and adjudicated and those whose accounts are yet unsettled and subject to additional credits, stating the nature of such accounts and the credits in question; the statement to embrace the accounts of all such officers or parties in which such balances have respectively accrued since the 1st day of January, 1830, and to set forth respectively and as near as practicable the period over which the accounts extended and the amounts involved therein.

Also to furnish a detailed statement of the stocks held by the United States in trust or to secure moneys paid, the character of such stocks, under what law or by what authority, and at what time the same were acquired, and on what amount thereof, if any, has there been a default in the payment of interest due thereon.

Mr. DAVIS. This resolution is a long step in the right direction. Though there are to my mind some omissions in it, and some amendments might be of great service, yet as the chairman of the Finance Committee [Mr. SHERMAN] asks its present consideration, I do not want to delay the information a single day. Therefore, without offering any amendments at all, I simply ask that the papers and resolution be printed.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the resolution as amended.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask that the resolution and papers be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and that order will be made.

DECORATIONS TO NAVAL OFFICERS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 4) authorizing Captain Temple and Lieutenant-Commander Whiting, of the Navy, to accept a decoration from the King of the Hawaiian Islands, to report it back and recommend its passage. I ask its present consideration, as it is a formal matter.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It authorizes Captain William G. Temple and Lieutenant-Commander William H. Whiting, of the United States Navy, to accept the cross of officers of the Order of Kamehameha I, conferred upon them by the King of the Hawaiian Islands as evidence of His Majesty's appreciation of those officers in connection with his visit to Washington.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WADLEIGH (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 418) to legalize assignments of pay of officers and others in the Government service; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 419) for the relief of William H. Ward; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WINDOM. By request, and without committing myself to all of its provisions, I ask leave, without notice, to introduce a bill.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 420) respecting the limits of reservations for town sites upon the public domain; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KERNAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 421) referring to the Court of Claims for adjudication and determination the claims of the parties therein named for the past and future use of the Norton post-marking and postage-canceling hand-stamp and the Robertson improved hand-stamp; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. KERNAN. I desire to state that I present this bill by request. I move that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All these bills, so far as I know, which are to authorize people to bring suits against the United States in the Court of Claims, have gone to the Committee on the Judiciary, whenever that has appeared; and although that committee is overburdened with work, I think it due to the regular order of business in the Senate to make a suggestion that bills providing for a suit at law ought to go to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. KERNAN. This bill, I find from the party requesting me to introduce it, has been before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. I do not know what discussion has been had upon it, but it was either passed or reported favorably, and that is the reason why I ask now that it be referred to that committee. I understand they are familiar with it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and printed, if there be no objection.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 422) to amend section 190 of the Revised Statutes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I desire to submit a bill that it may be printed, and I give notice that I shall move to substitute it for Senate bill No. 2, to repeal section 2303 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, making restrictions in the disposition of the public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida, when that bill is up for consideration.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 423) to repeal the pre-emption laws and to provide for the sale of timber upon the public lands of the United States; which was read twice by its title, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. MORTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 424) for the relief of Rev. Erastus Lathrop; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SURVEYS IN NORTH CAROLINA AND VIRGINIA.

Mr. MERRIMON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish for the use of the Senate the report and accompanying maps, diagrams, estimates, &c., made in pursuance of the act approved March 3, 1875, directing the survey of "a line between the Neuse and Cape Fear Rivers, in North Carolina, with a view to connect the waters of the same; and a like line with a view to connect the waters of the Norfolk Harbor, in Virginia, with the waters of the Cape Fear River, at or near Wilmington, North Carolina."

WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be, and it is hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an adequate provision for the speedy completion of the Washington Monument, in the city of Washington, and that it have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

PUBLIC LANDS IN SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. WRIGHT. If there be no other resolutions, I ask the Senate to proceed to consider Senate bill No. 58, which was before the Senate yesterday morning, and which I had unanimous consent, I believe, to call up this morning.

Mr. CLAYTON. I ask the Senator from Iowa to allow me to give a notice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield for that purpose?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAYTON. I desire to give notice to the Senate that when the centennial bill is disposed of, or as soon thereafter as I can get the attention of the Senate, I will call up Senate bill No. 2, to repeal section 2303 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, making restrictions in the disposition of the public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida. I am satisfied that the measure is going to elicit more discussion than the morning hour this morning will admit of, and for that reason I give notice that I will call it up as soon as the centennial bill is disposed of.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF SAINT ALBANS.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask the Senate to resume the consideration of Senate bill No. 58; and I may state that when it was before the Senate yesterday morning the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] asked time to examine the bill, and I understand that he has examined it, and is satisfied with the report. I trust there will be no difficulty now in passing the bill. It was read yesterday, and the report also.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 58) to pay the First National Bank of Saint Albans, in the county of Franklin, and State of Vermont, the value of certain United States Treasury notes held by said bank as financial agent of the United States, and forcibly taken therefrom by raiders from Canada in October, 1864; the pending question being on the amendment of the Committee on Finance, in line 10, to strike out the words, "with interest thereon from the 19th day of October, 1864, to the time of such payment."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALCORN rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi rise in regard to the bill just passed?

Mr. ALCORN. The purpose for which I rose has ceased. I rose to have the yeas and nays called on the passage of the bill which I thought ought not to pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Mississippi rose for that purpose the Chair will regard the question as still being upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. ALCORN. I have accomplished my purpose by stating my object in rising.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. KELLY. I ask the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 14. I do not think it will take a very long time. It is simply for the purpose of extending the time for the completion of the Northern Pacific Railway. It limits the grant rather than extends it; but it is for the purpose of giving the company a little longer time for the completion of the road. I move to take up the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 14) to extend the time for the construction and completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Railroads reported an amendment to the bill, so as to make it read:

That ten years' additional time is hereby granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to construct and complete its road under its charter and the resolutions of Congress relating thereto; and the proviso to section 1 of the act of July 15, 1870, entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1871, and for other purposes," which requires the payment of the costs of surveys by said company, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. That this extension is granted upon the express condition and understanding that where pre-emption and homestead claims were initiated or private entries and locations were allowed upon lands embraced in the grant to said company prior to the receipt of the orders of withdrawal at the respective district land offices, the same may be perfected and carried into patent, and the company shall be entitled to indemnity therefor as now provided by law: Provided, That this condition shall not apply to lands heretofore patented to the company nor to entries already canceled and upon which the purchase-money or other consideration has been returned to the respective parties in interest.

SEC. 3. That entries remaining unadjusted and suspended in the General Land Office on account of an increase in price of the even sections within the limits of the grant, where the same were made or based upon settlement made prior to the receipt of the respective orders of withdrawal aforesaid, shall be relieved from such suspension and carried into patent; but nothing in this act shall be construed to affect existing adjustments nor to authorize the refunding of any moneys received for such lands under existing laws.

SEC. 4. That the extension of time granted by section 1 of this act shall not apply to the branch line of said road from Lake Pend d'Oreille, across the Cascade Mountains, to Puget Sound in Washington Territory; but all acts and parts of acts, so far as they make any grant of lands or other aid for the construction of said branch, are hereby repealed; and the lands heretofore granted therefor shall be, and they are hereby, restored to the public domain, to be dealt with as other public lands under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 5. That the said Northern Pacific Railroad Company shall file with the Secretary of the Interior, within six months from the date hereof, its assent to, and acceptance of, the provisions of this act, or be forever debarred from taking or receiving any benefit from or under the same.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Oregon when the time fixed for the completion of this road by law now will expire; how much time they have to go on?

Mr. KELLY. A little more than a year from the present time. I do not know the exact date, and cannot tell without reference to the act, although I know it is in 1877, and that is the reason why the company desire the present consideration of the bill, so that they may know what to do. It is the intention of the company to prosecute its work if further time be allowed for the completion of it. Although there is a year remaining, yet for a work of such magnitude it would hardly be expected of the company to commence construction now when so much remains to be completed.

I will say that there are five hundred and fifty-five miles of this road already completed. The company is now out of debt. A great amount of money, it is true, has been expended; some $30,000,000 have already been expended upon the construction of that portion of the road already constructed. Bonds were issued and a mortgage given to those who loaned their money for the purpose of building the road. That mortgage has been foreclosed, the company being unable to pay the money. The bondholders, the mortgagees bought it in at the foreclosure sale, and now they are the owners of the road or have preferred stock in the company, taking the road of course for the indebtedness, so the company is now unincumbered; and if the time be extended for the completion of the road they are quite confident that they can procure capital and commence the construction of it immediately. I understand that it is the intention of the company to prosecute the work the coming summer if this bill shall be passed; and as the great Northwest is entirely disconnected by railroad with the other portions of the country, I think it is due to that section and to the North that this extension should be allowed.

It will be perceived that the bill as reported by the Committee on Railroads protects those who have taken homestead and pre-emption claims between the time of the filing of the map and the withdrawal of the lands at the local land offices. Senators will remember the discussion which arose the other day about a bill that passed the Senate for the same object—that is, to relieve settlers. This is an adequate protection to those who took up homesteads and those who filed pre-emption claims between those dates, as also those who have purchased lands, I think giving them ample protection. The company has consented, or at least it will be bound to consent to this if it accepts the extension, and I understand there will be no opposition to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator allow me? On that point I should like to have his explanation of the provision that, where the lands are now held under pre-emption or homestead entries, the holders of the lands shall have title; but this bill provides that the company shall be entitled to "indemnity therefor as now provided by law."

Mr. KELLY. The provision is that the company has a right to select new lands, as they are termed, where homestead and pre-emption claimants have taken a portion of the odd sections, or where there had been reservations made for governmental purposes. In such cases the company is authorized to take lands in lieu of those, within ten miles beyond the limit; and this simply authorizes the company, where these lands have been taken by pre-emption and homestead claimants, to go within the ten-mile limit beyond and be indemnified by other lands in lieu of these. That is the provision. It is simply giving to homestead and pre-emption claimants the right to the lands they occupy, and allowing the company to take other lands in lieu of them.

It will be perceived, by the fifth section I think, that this extension does not apply to what is known as the branch extending to Puget Sound across the Cascade Mountains, a distance, I presume, of about five hundred miles, so that that land will be restored to the public domain as soon as the time limited by the present grant shall have expired. So this is lessening the grant, instead of extending it; and, taking everything into consideration, it seems to me it is but an act of justice to the people of the Northwest that the time should be extended.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, I am disposed to look with some favor upon legislation that will give us a competing line to the Pacific. Realizing as I do, and as do the citizens of my State, the burdens which are imposed upon us by a monopoly, I think I shall not vote against the extension of the time during which this road may be built, but at the same time I suggest that in passing such a bill we ought to take all reasonable precautions that the settlers who are upon these lands may be protected in their rights. Were this a new proposition to grant this wide belt of country on both sides of this road, I think I should vote against it. Originally I voted against it, thinking that Congress had carried too far the policy of making land grants to railroads, and I saw furthermore that these land grants were used for the purpose of obtaining a credit abroad, increasing very largely the indebtedness borne by our people and the amount of interest which we were compelled to pay to foreigners, sometimes for the building of roads which the business of the country did not require.

I am willing, however, to waive those considerations, and especially as Congress has determined that this grant should be made; but I suggest to the friends of this bill that they are raising again a difficulty which we attempted to obviate by a bill which was passed the other day, with regard to settlers who in good faith go upon these lands. I stated in debate at that time—and I wish again to call the attention of the Senate to it—that these grants lie for years and years unsurveyed and unsegregated; that no pre-emption settlers and no homestead settler can procure title from the Government of the United States until such time as those surveys are made and the land is segregated, entered on the tract-books, and can be certified at the land office; then he can take proceedings to ripen his inchoate right into a title.

This grant was made in 1864. Eleven years have passed, and during this time settlers have not been able on a vast proportion of these lands to procure any title, and it is now proposed to extend it for eight years longer, carrying forward into that dim future this disability under which settlers labor. Now this trouble arises: Settlers go upon these lands in good faith; they make their homes there; they die and their right passes to others, or they become insolvent, or they find that the climate where they settle is not favorable to their health and desire to move away, and they sell their pre-emptions or homesteads under the belief that they have a right to do so; and their successors, desiring only the same amount of land, purchase of them their homes, expecting to procure title whenever the lands are surveyed; but by the general pre-emption law no such sale is recognized, and these parties, finding that they cannot deraign from the original possessors of the land, are met by a railroad grant made prior to the time that they went upon the land, and they lose their homes, and to my knowledge they have lost them in my State by hundreds; they have lost them by the thousands upon railroad grants, simply because we extended the time, making it impossible for the settler to ripen his rights into a title. I think the legislation is careless, and in its effects is most heartless.

Now, there is no hurry about this bill. It is not necessary that it shall pass within the next ten minutes. I think it is due to this great interest to which I have adverted, and which certainly moved the Senate the other day in retaining a very important clause in a bill against strong opposition, that this bill be recommitted to the committee in order that they may see whether some apt amendment cannot be framed which will protect these settlers, which will prevent the railroad from acquiring title to these lands. It can be done in several ways. One is by a distinct and clear provision that where at the date of notice in the land office there was a settler either by pre-emption or homestead upon the lands who subsequently abandoned—and the word "abandoned" I use in the technical sense—who transferred his claim to another, which works an abandonment under the homestead law, the railroad company shall not take title to that land, but it shall be open to pre-emption or homestead by another settler, and if necessary go on and say that you will recognize to that limited extent a deraignment of title to this subsequent possessor from the individual from whom he had honestly bought. A provision of this kind will be just and humane, and there is a necessity for it, I know from what I have observed of the operation of these railroad grants. I doubt if Senators desire that an interest like this shall be neglected or that this oppression shall be visited upon the settlers.

While railroads are necessary and do much to build up the business of the country, they are not more necessary to the country than are settlers and the business which settlers bring with them. I submit the motion that this bill be recommitted in order that the committee may consider this proposition and report some amendment which will cover it.

Mr. KELLY. I do not wish to urge the passage of this bill without a full examination of it by those who think it has not been properly guarded. My own impression is that it is properly restricted, at least so far as concerns all settlers on the public lands before the notice of withdrawal was filed in the local land office. I do not wish to urge it now if there is plausible objection to it, but I am willing that the bill shall go over until to-morrow or such time as Senators can examine it. I do not wish it to lose its place as the order of business, for the reason, as I stated in the opening remarks I made, that the company is desirous that the work shall be commenced at an early day. So with the distinct understanding that the bill shall be the order of business, and only on that understanding, will I consent that it shall go over till to-morrow.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask that it be referred to the committee.

Mr. WEST. I trust the Senator from California will not insist on the motion to recommit, because with the opportunity that he will have between now and to-morrow I am satisfied he will be convinced that the very point he desires to guard in the case of settlers is met by this bill. If, after examination to-morrow, he should not be of that opinion, and should move for a recommittal, perhaps the Senate would be more in disposition to do it; but I think the better plan to-day is to let it go over, and he can renew his motion to recommit to-morrow if he shall think it proper.

Mr. INGALLS. I desire to give notice that when this bill is called up again for action by the Senate I shall move to strike out the proviso contained in the second section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By common consent the bill will lie over until to-morrow. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does that common consent mean that it is to exclude all other business to-morrow until it is disposed of?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not a special order. A vote of the Senate can dispose of it. The morning hour has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1053) providing for the payment of judgments rendered under section 11 of chapter 459 of the laws of the Forty-third Congress.

The message also announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of said commissioners, and for other purposes, asked a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. A. H. BUCKNER of Missouri, Mr. G. W. CATE of Wisconsin, and Mr. GEORGE WILLARD of Michigan, managers on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 356) concerning cases in bankruptcy commenced in the supreme courts of the several Territories prior to the 22d of June, 1874, and now undetermined therein;

A bill (H. R. No. 390) to repeal the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, and all laws and parts of laws amendatory thereof;

A bill (H. R. No. 555) to amend section 856 of the Revised Statutes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1210) authorizing actions in cases of death resulting from wrongful act, neglect, or default.

ENROLLED BILLS.

The message also announced that the Speaker had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 62) to authorize George P. Marsh to accept a certain present from the government of Switzerland and a certain present from the government of Italy;

A bill (H. R. No. 1053) providing for the payment of judgments rendered under section 11 of chapter 459 of the laws of the first session of the Forty-third Congress; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 11) authorizing G. Harris Heap, United States consul at Tunis, to accept a trust as commissioner of the Bey of Tunis.

CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 514) relating to the centennial celebration of American Independence.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, the facts and legislation upon which this appropriation is asked are stated in the preamble of this bill. It proceeds upon the assumption that, as for a public service or some obligation or undertaking on the part of the Government, it is a fit and proper thing for Congress to appropriate $1,500,000 to aid in this enterprise. As much is implied as the judgment of the Senate in sending the bill to the Committee on Appropriations.

On a former occasion the Senate of the United States hesitated to make a pecuniary contribution to this enterprise from the uncertainty of the future contributions it might under the circumstances then existing be called upon to make. But, according to my understanding of the general relations of Congress to this enterprise and of this enterprise to the American people at the present time, the period for argument and hestitation and doubt seems to have passed; and that, whatever speculation of opinion there may have been, it has crystallized now into a national sentiment that the American people this year are to celebrate that august event, the Declaration of Independence in 1776, by a grand international exposition, in which the representatives of the nations of the Old World are to gather around Independence Hall in Philadelphia to pay homage to the New World, bringing with them the products of their art, of their industries, and of their civilization.

Mr. President, in the few words I think it necessary to address to the Senate in opening this matter to their attention I shall confine myself entirely to the attitude of Congress to this question and the relations it may be supposed to sustain by its own acts. In the first place, I submit that Congress inaugurated this centennial celebration by its own enactment in 1871; and that it is to be an international exposition is no longer a question of doubt. Let me read the preamble, which sets forth the statement of Congress on that question:

> Whereas the Declaration of Independence of the United States of America was prepared, signed, and promulgated in the year 1776, in the city of Philadelphia; and whereas it behooves the people of the United States to celebrate, by appropriate ceremonies, the centennial anniversary of this memorable and decisive event.

Mr. President, I desire to emphasize this statement, because here begins our connection with the enterprise for which we are now asked to make a pecuniary contribution. It behooves the United States, the American people, the Government of the American people, to celebrate this great event; here begins the relation of Congress to this enterprise; there begins its interest; and here, I think, we shall find, if we examine the history of events from that period to the present, begins its responsibility. A little further on we shall see what was the idea of this celebration.

> And whereas it is deemed fitting that the completion of the first century of our national existence shall be commemorated by an exhibition of the natural resources of the country and their development, and of its progress in those arts which benefit mankind, in comparison with those of older nations; and whereas no place is so appropriate for such an exhibition as the city in which occurred the event it is designed to commemorate; and whereas, as the exhibition should be a national celebration, in which the people of the whole country should participate, it should have the sanction of the Congress of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, look at the facts stated in the preamble. First, the United States announces the celebration; second, that the enterprise shall have the sanction of Congress. I pause only to say that whatever has been done in Philadelphia, in Pennsylvania, in the States at large, by individuals, has all been done in the name of the United States, the United States taking the initiative, declaring the fitness of things, and declaring, moreover, that it should be done under its authority and under its sanction.

The next fact which tends to commit the Government of the United States is the further provision of the act that "the exhibition of American and foreign arts and products and manufactures shall be held under the auspices of the Government of the United States in the city of Philadelphia in the year 1876." In the next section of the act a commission was provided for "whose duty it shall be to prepare and superintend the execution of a plan for holding the exhibition." Thus taking, by its authority, the direction and control and supervision of the whole work. A commission was instituted with authority to examine plans, and the whole subject was to be reported upon by this commission to Congress at its next session.

So much for the inauguration of this enterprise. The next question was of course the creation of the funds necessary for its completion. How is Congress connected with that? Where does its obligation begin and end? Having inaugurated the proposition, Congress was to create the funds or to provide the means for creating the funds. I am aware—and I would not have it overlooked in this connection—that the act provided:

And the United States shall not be liable for any expenses attending such exhibition or by reason of the same.

Undoubtedly Congress did not intend to authorize those who were acting as its agents to incur on its account any legal liability. That is not the proposition I am arguing; I am arguing the responsibility of the Government growing out of its relations to this enterprise. Although it would not allow its agents to involve its Treasury or involve its faith, the responsibility it has taken has identified it with it in such a way as that, I submit, it becomes the duty of the Government of the United States at this period in the progress of events to lend its aid; and that its interests, its honor, its faith, in my judgment, are involved in the success of the centennial exposition.

Coming, then, to the question of raising the means, Congress also interposed its authority and lent its sanction. It created the next year, in 1872, a board of finance, to which was committed the duty of providing the ways and means by an appeal to the American people at large. As it was determined by Congress that the celebration of this great event should be by an international exposition, it was thought the best method of providing the ways and means would be to appeal to the people at large. Hence a board of finance was authorized to issue certificates of stock to present to the people for subscriptions.

Now, coming down to the question of ways and means, I have this to say—and this is the point at which the parties come and ask the favor of Congress to grant them the aid which they hold they have a right to ask from the position and relations of Congress to the enterprise from the beginning—in 1872 the board of finance, authorized and created by this act of Congress, proceeded to the execution of their work. I will not stop here to detail its progress; that is matter of history; that is matter of information I suppose common to all of us. That the buildings have been erected, that they are now near completion, that the enterprise is an assured success, is beyond controversy, beyond cavil.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Without this money do you mean?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No, sir; I do not say without it. I will present that question so that the Senator will see by and by whether there is a necessity for this or not. My own belief is that it will be carried out if Congress withholds this appropriation. That is not the ground on which the bill is presented. I have no doubt at all that it will be a success if Congress withholds the appropriation; but I am not here to argue the legal responsibility of Congress, because that in every stage of it has been provided against. But I am here to present the relations which Congress has to this enterprise. It is a great national enterprise, which has been from the beginning under the sanction of Congress and under its authority; and it has reached a point now where the honor, the faith, and the good name, in my judgment, of the Congress of the United States are in it. It has become emphatically a great national question, which the Congress of the United States cannot afford to turn its back upon.

Well, Mr. President, to return to the question of finance. As I have said, the general expectation in Congress and out of Congress was that funds might be obtained by an appeal to the people of the several States. That has failed. That has failed from the operation of causes which could not have been foreseen. It is believed that but that for the panic of 1873 funds enough could have been procured from the American people without an appeal to Congress. As the matter now stands, I am authorized to say that the bills have all been paid up to the present time and that $1,537,100 will pay all expenditures from this time up to the time of the opening of the exposition on the 10th of May next, leaving it entirely free of debt. I have a list of these expenditures here. I do not know that it is necessary that I should read it. I believe it has been so often in print that it is hardly worth while that I should do so.

Then, Mr. President, to state simply the position upon which this application rests; having shown that the exposition proceeds by authority of Congress; that Congress inaugurated the enterprise; that it has advanced under its sanction; that Congress undertook to provide the ways and means as demonstrated, and the people in Pennsylvania, and chiefly the city of Philadelphia, having raised the funds thus far expended and the anticipated resources having failed, they ask that the people's representatives should supply the deficiency of $1,500,000 out of six or seven millions, which will be the whole expense, and thus enable them to go into this exposition on the 10th of May next free of debt.

Mr. President, there is one other feature to which I shall advert, and that is the international character of the exposition. It is not only a national celebration, but an international celebration, and the Government of the United States has connected itself with that feature as well as with the national celebration. I have here a list of the nations who have been invited to attend this celebration by the President of the United States and who have accepted those invitations and are to be here. In fact, their representatives are already here, making elaborate preparations for the exhibition. They are thirty-six in number. I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read a few of these acceptances, that the Senate may see the relations which the Government of the United States has to foreign nations on this subject. I send the acceptance of the invitation from Russia.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

ST. PETERSBURG, 3-15 October, 1875,
Imperial Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Department of Internal Relations.

No. 8082.]

Mr. MINISTER: The imperial ministry has taken into serious consideration the communications both written and verbal, which you have been good enough to make to it on the subject of the universal exhibition to take place at Philadelphia in 1876.

It follows from these communications that this new international gathering will differ essentially from the previous exhibitions at London, Paris, and Vienna.

The Philadelphia exhibition, by making part of the fêtes arranged for the celebration of the centennial jubilee of the Independence of the United States of America, presents itself on this very account as an essentially national undertaking, in which friendly nations are invited to participate.

These considerations have been the subject of a report to His Majesty the Emperor, and my august master has deemed it agreeable to the traditions of friendship which have always existed between Russia and the United States to accept the cordial invitation from the Cabinet of Washington to take part in a national solemnity for commemorating one of the grandest facts in the history of humanity.

By supreme order a special commission has been constituted in the ministry of finance, under the presidency of the privy councilor Butofsky, for the organization of the Russian section of the Philadelphia exhibition.

I have hastened to communicate the foregoing to our representative at Washington, and I have requested him to bring it to the knowledge of the United States Government.

Accept, Mr. Minister, the assurance of my most distinguished consideration.

BARON JOMINI.

Mr. BOKER, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Now I send to the desk to be read the acceptance of Germany.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[Translation.]

BERLIN, January 2, 1874.

SIR: In pursuance of my dispatch of October 29 last, relative to the international exhibition intended to be held in the year 1876 at Philadelphia, I request you respectfully to communicate to the Secretary of State, Mr. Fish, that the German Empire accepts with the sincerest thanks the invitation of the Government of the United States of America to take part in the above-mentioned exhibition. The appointment of a special commission for the exhibition, as also of a plenipotentiary of the same residing in Philadelphia, will therefore be made in time.

I reserve me a special communication in this matter, and beg to be furnished with the rules proposed under No. 10 of the general regulations as soon as the same shall have been published.

The Chancellor of the Empire, BISMARCK.

To the Imperial German Envoy, Mr. VON SCHLÖZER, &c., Washington.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has the Senator from Maine the letters to which these are replies?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No, sir; but I understand the Senator from Vermont to have the whole body of the correspondence between the State Department and foreign governments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As to Russia I was looking for the letter of Mr. Schuyler or Mr. Jewell or Mr. Boker, whoever it may have been, to the minister of foreign affairs of Russia giving the invitation, as it is called, but I do not find it. I did not know but that the Senator from Maine had it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I suppose the papers are all here. My understanding is that thirty-six nations have accepted the invitation. I will now send the acceptance from Turkey to the desk and ask the Clerk to read it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[Translation.]

SUBLIME PORTE, MINISTRY OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
February 17, 1875.

No. 39922.]

Mr. MINISTER RESIDENT: The Imperial Government, having accepted the invitation of the Cabinet of Washington, has decided to take part in the international exhibition which will take place at Philadelphia in 1876.

The necessary dispositions have already been made to that effect. I request you kindly to inform your Government of it, and to accept the assurances of my very distinguished consideration,

SAFVET.

Mr. BOKER,
Minister Resident of the United States of America, &c.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will not trouble the Senate to have more of these communications read. Suffice it to say that I understand the whole body of correspondence between the Secretary of State and foreign nations is in the Senate and can be referred to, if Senators desire more on this point.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, when this subject was first presented to Congress I was under the impression that an appropriation of money of this character was not warranted by the Constitution; but a subsequent examination of the subject leads me to believe that Congress has power to appropriate money to any object that it deems to be for the common defense or general welfare of the United States. The power of taxation in the Constitution is given in express terms, and the purposes for which taxation may be imposed are stated in the same paragraph, and one branch of those purposes is to provide for the common defense and the general welfare of the United States; that is the substance of the language. Therefore I am of opinion, saying nothing about this preamble, but looking to the bill itself, that we have the constitutional authority to make this appropriation; because it would be equivalent to a declaration by Congress that the general welfare of the United States required this expenditure of money. As I say, in respect to the expenditure of money I do not understand that the power of Congress is limited to any one of the specific objects which Congress is authorized to provide for in a subsequent part of the Constitution.

There have been three views taken of this clause in the Constitution: The first is, that this power to provide for the common defense and general welfare is an unlimited power, and authorizes Congress to do anything by way of affirmative legislation which we think to be for the general welfare; but that notion has been long since exploded, I think. The next view that has been taken of it has been that the power to provide for the common defense and general welfare, even by an appropriation of money, was confined to the specific execution of the other powers in the Constitution enumerated in the order in which they stand. The third interpretation that has been given (which I think is the true one) is to treat the clause of taxation, of which this provision about the common defense and general welfare is a part, as an independent and plenary power to raise money by taxes imposed upon the people of the United States, and to dispose of that money thus raised in any manner that Congress believes to be for the general welfare of the people of the United States. Such was the opinion to which the earlier rulers of this country came when, in one instance, the question about the Cumberland road was a question greatly mooted under the Constitution. It was maintained, with a good deal of show of reason, that Congress had no power to build the Cumberland road; but President Monroe, although he stated in a message to Congress that in his opinion Congress had no power under the Constitution to provide for building that road, so far as any action was concerned, yet was clearly of opinion that, the road having been built, Congress had the power, under this clause of the Constitution to which I have referred, to raise money and appropriate it to keep the road in repair, although the thing itself, so far as Congress had any connection with it, was outside the constitutional power of the Government. I believe this is the conclusion of Judge Story, who deals with the subject very elaborately in his Commentaries on the Constitution; and I believe it to be the sound conclusion. Therefore, so far as the bill itself is concerned, saying nothing of its preamble, which I think in any event ought to be struck out, it is not open to any objection on the ground of constitutionality.

But it is unfortunate, Mr. President, that the thing stands in the attitude in which it does now. Had this arrangement or enterprise, whatever name we give it, met the support of the people of the United States individually, as it was expected and believed it would do, there would have been ample funds to carry it on to complete success without imposing on the people any burdens in the way of taxation, and we should not have been applied to as we were a year or two ago for an appropriation which was then refused, and we should not have been applied to now for an appropriation which the House of Representatives has provided and which we are asked to concur in. It was not the expectation, if as evidence of it we can take the declarations of the promoters of this celebration, it was not the expectation, if we can take the specific reservations and exclusions in the act of Congress authorizing it, that the Treasury should in any event be taxed to aid it or support it; and in the very first act it was stated that the people of the country, and of Pennsylvania in particular who would chiefly so far as renown and so far as material benefits were concerned, receive the advantage of it, and also that provision would be made by the promoters of the enterprise without any assistance from Congress for carrying it to a conclusion; and in order, as I say, to make this secure it was provided in the act of March 3, 1871, which created the Centennial Commission—

That whenever the President shall be informed by the governor of the State of Pennsylvania that provision has been made for the erection of suitable buildings for the purpose, and for the exclusive control by the commission herein provided for of the proposed exhibition, the President shall, through the Department of State, make proclamation of the same, setting forth the time at which the exhibition will open and the place at which it will be held; and he shall communicate to the diplomatic representatives of all nations copies of the same, together with such regulations as may be adopted by the commissioners, for publication in their respective countries.

Thereupon, on the 24th of June, 1873, the governor addressed this communication to the President of the United States:

EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Harrisburg, June 24, 1873.

Pursuant to the provisions of section 8 of the act of Congress approved March 3 1871, providing for a national celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of American Independence, a copy of which act is appended hereto, the undersigned, governor of the State of Pennsylvania, has the honor to inform the President that provision has been made for the erection of suitable buildings for the purposes of the international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and products of the soil and mine proposed to be held at Philadelphia in the year 1876, and for the exclusive control of the said exhibition by the United States Centennial Commission, as it will appear by a copy hereto annexed of the notice, duly certified to me by the United States Centennial Commission and the centennial board of finance, that said provision has been made pursuant to the provisions of aforesaid act of Congress.

The undersigned makes this announcement to enable the President, in accordance with the requirements of the act above mentioned, to issue his proclamation concerning the said exhibition, and to cause official invitations to be given to foreign governments to participate therein.

J. F. HARTRANFT.

That is accompanied by the certificates, to which the governor of the State of Pennsylvania refers, of the gentleman having the matter in charge, stating to him that this provision has been made. You will observe that by the act of Congress the President of the United States was to rely solely upon the governor of the State of Pennsylvania. He had no means, under this act of Congress or otherwise, of ascertaining whether it was a fact, so far as the actual provision should be made or the actual management carried on, that suitable buildings had been provided for; and therefore the sole evidence to him, and the conclusive evidence to him, was this official certificate of the governor of the State of Pennsylvania.

At the date I have named, about two years ago, the governor of the State of Pennsylvania informed the President of the United States, upon which the President's action was taken, that suitable provision for the buildings had been made, and for their exclusive control by the gentlemen in charge. If the governor of Pennsylvania was correct in that statement, then I shall be glad to have the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations tell the Senate how it is that this bill declares that we, by this million and a half of dollars, are to provide "for completing the centennial buildings and other preparations." I do not understand what this communication could have meant and what the eighth section of the act of Congress authorizing this commission could have meant, if it did not mean, as certainly I believe as a fact it was intended to mean, that, before the United States by any act of its Executive should be the medium of communicating invitations to anybody, we should have the final and absolute assurance that the necessary money had been provided or other means by which these buildings should be brought into a process of completion and turned over to the exclusive control of this board, ready to receive the objects which should be brought by the people of various countries for exhibition.

I think it will take a great deal of ingenuity to show that there is any other fair interpretation of this provision of the act of Congress and of this communication from the governor of Pennsylvania than what its plain language imports; that is, that adequate, complete provision had been made which would insure the erection of the proper buildings and their being put into a proper condition for the uses of the exhibition. Now it turns out to be untrue. If we are to take the representations upon which this bill is founded, it turns out to be untrue that suitable provision had been made or that any adequate provision had been made; and yet on the faith of it the President of the United States, in the exercise of his duty and under the supplemental act, also in the exercise of his duty, has communicated to foreign governments the fact that such an exhibition is to be held and has invited them, pursuant to the act of Congress based upon the faith of these representations thus officially made to us that all that was required now was that the people who had objects of art, of industry, and of science to exhibit should come forward and put them in place.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Has the Senator the date in 1873 when that communication was made by the governor of Pennsylvania?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir; the 24th of June, 1873.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Now, if the Senator will allow me I will say one word——

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will excuse me, I will be done in a minute.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Very well.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Following that, Mr. President, which as I was saying I hope can be satisfactorily explained, because to my mind it calls for a full explanation, we come to the next stage in this operation, that by a subsequent act of Congress further provision was made. On the 5th of June, 1874, the additional act of Congress was passed which the Senator from Maine has read:

That the President be requested to extend, in the name of the United States, a respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of other nations to be represented and take part in the international exposition to be held at Philadelphia, under the auspices of the Government of the United States, in the year 1876: Provided, however, That the United States shall not be liable, directly or indirectly, for any expenses attending such exposition or by reason of the same.

The prior communications made by the President were not invitations; he had no authority to make them, and did not make them; but by this act he was directed to extend invitations, which he did, and here we have the correspondence and circulars addressed to our representatives at various foreign capitals, directing them to present this subject in pursuance of this act of Congress to the various governments to which they were accredited; and they proceeded to do so. In some instances our representatives in making that communication, as I see by the papers, accompanied it with a copy of the act of Congress which I have last referred to, which therefore gave distinct information to the foreign government that so far as providing means for it was concerned, the United States had nothing to do with it; and in some of the communications not only was the act communicated, but also attention was drawn to that provision of it. But, unhappily, in others of these communications I find that our ministers abroad did not communicate to the foreign governments the circumstance that it was not in all respects a Government exposition to which the Government was inviting, as a king would do to a royal banquet that he was to pay for himself, all our fellow-cosmopolitans over the whole world. Well, acceptances came to these invitations, acceptances to those where they did understand it as well as to those where they did not; and I am obliged to confess that the result is to my mind, inasmuch as many of these governments were not informed of the whole truth about this business, that we are in honor bound as to them (and of course that covers the whole question, because we cannot make provision for one without making provision for all) not to disappoint those nations who, being kept in ignorance of precisely what the condition of affairs was, have accepted the invitation that we have extended to them and their subjects and citizens, and have made extensive preparations, at large expense undoubtedly, for going into the exhibition. That is the result to which I have come in studying this thing and looking at its history. What is to be said in respect of the means by which we are led to be obliged to appropriate a million and a half of dollars that we never intended to appropriate, that we took at every step especial care to declare by public statutue we were not to be called upon to appropriate, is another question. But with that other question of course the foreign governments and their citizens whom we have invited to come here have nothing to do.

I have only to add, Mr. President, in dismissing this subject as far as I am concerned, one or two further observations. In the first place, I wish to say that I believe it will turn out that this million and a half of dollars which is here appropriated will not be adequate to carry this exhibition through in the way in which it ought to be carried through, and that we shall be called upon for further appropriations, notwithstanding this act repeats what all the previous acts have contained, "that the Government of the United States shall not, under any circumstances, be liable for any debt or obligation of the United States Centennial Commission or the centennial board of finance, or any payment in addition to the foregoing sum." These words that I have read I believe will turn out to be just as effectual as and no more so than similar words that we have heard in the two preceding acts of Congress we have passed on this subject. It will be found that the Treasury of the United States must be called upon for still further appropriations, and it may be found, as I am very much afraid as I have said it is in this present instance, that in order to redeem and defend the national honor we may be obliged to take the step and pay the money. If our invitation to foreign exhibitors and foreign governments, covering a large proportion of all the civilized governments of the world, means anything, (and it certainly seems to do so,) we are bound to do everything in respect of those governments and their citizens and subjects that good faith and fair dealing can require. We are bound, for the time being at any rate, in my opinion, to see that they are properly received and provided for. I do not mean that their board bills are to be paid by any means; but I mean that where citizens and subjects of other countries come here in great numbers under such circumstances, if through the ten thousand accidents of business and life any of them come to necessity and distress of any kind, we are bound in the exercise of a fair hospitality to get them out of it; we are bound to see that their goods are properly protected; we are bound to see that their premiums and awards and medals are properly provided for. In other words, every engagement which the Centennial Commission and the centennial board of finance may properly enter into or properly ought to enter into in respect of all that is due to foreign exhibitors we stand from this time forth as the proper guarantors for the proper performance of. So then I wish to put in a caveat, if you call this a caveat, or a proviso, that we should not any further delude ourselves with the notion that we are not committed, this bill passing, to all the consequences of seeing this thing completely through and disposed of. We must not be surprised if we are called upon to appropriate another million or two or three millions more.

In the next place, Mr. President, I wish to state what will be the result, as it appears to me, if this exhibition should on the contrary turn out to be a financial success; and that it will be a success in respect of the objects it has in view if we provide this money I have very little doubt. It would be a success if nobody but the people of the United States exhibited at it, for the resources and the invention and the industry of this country are boundless. But if it should be a success in respect of finance, and there should be accumulated from the various fees and incomes of the body a large sum of money, the House bill has provided that that money shall not be divided among the stockholders until, after paying the company's debts, this million and a half shall be re-imbursed to the Treasury of the United States; but the House bill has failed to provide that this provision shall be assented to by the Centennial Commission or by the centennial board of finance. Now, these persons, in the sense in which they are acting, are a private corporation. They have stock; they have directors; they are in all essential respects for business purposes a private corporation. I very much question whether we have power by a direct statement in an act of Congress, not assented to by them, to declare under what circumstances they shall make their dividends or what they shall do with their money.

Then, Mr. President, at the proper time, in order to give this clause effect if there should be sufficient good fortune in a financial way to bring out a balance at the end of this affair, I shall move to add to the second section, which now provides—

That the money by this act appropriated shall be paid to the treasurer of the centennial board of finance only after he and the president of the board shall have executed a bond in the sum of $500,000 to the United States, with sufficient security, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the safe-keeping and faithful disbursement of the sum hereby appropriated—

These words:

And only after the Centennial Commission and the centennial board of finance shall respectively file in the Treasury Department of the United States a resolution duly passed, declaring their assent to the provisions of this act.

We shall then, in respect of the application of any profits that they may gain out of the exhibition, have got a compact with two parties to it. We shall then have an obligation which, if there should be any money left, will bind them to obey this provision now existing in the House bill for repaying this million and a half before making a dividend. Without it, in my opinion, they would not be legally bound to do so.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator allow me to direct his attention to a proposition here?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SARGENT. The bill as it is before us provides that there shall be no dividend or percentage of profits paid to the holders of stock until after the re-imbursement of the amount of this appropriation. I should like to ask the Senator whether the proper construction of that is not that the stockholders shall receive back their money which they have paid on their stock before this appropriation shall be reimbursed to the Government of the United States. In other words, I ask whether this does not refer to profits after that stock has been paid. I think that is the construction of it, and consequently the amendment proposed by the Senator would not have the effect of requiring this money to be paid before the stock shall be returned to the stockholders.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I entirely disagree, I am sorry to say, with my friend from California as to the meaning of the phrase in the bill to which he has alluded; but if he were right the amendment would be just as proper. The amendment does not enlarge the existing provision as to the repayment of the money. It only says that we will not advance the money until the two corporations, if you call them such, the Centennial Commission and the centennial board of finance, shall themselves assent to the provisions of this act. Then the question is, what are the provisions of the act?

Mr. SARGENT. Let me make myself a little clearer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think I understand my friend perfectly, and I ask him to hear me a moment. I understand him to maintain that the true application of these words, "shall be paid in full into the Treasury of the United States before any dividend or percentage of the profits shall be paid to the holders of said stock," means that before this money is repaid to the Treasury there may be paid the principal of the stock which the stockholders have paid in.

Mr. SARGENT. In other words, the words "dividend" and "percentage" have the same meaning substantially.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was quite sure that I understood my friend. I entirely disagree to that construction. I understand the words "any dividend" followed by the words "or percentage of the profits" to mean that there shall be no dividends of any kind. When a private corporation is wound up and there are no profits at all, the stockholders get back their original investment, if it has not been lost, by a dividend. It is a term of art. A dividend is that thing which is to be divided according to the interests of the persons who are entitled to share in the division. There may, therefore, just as properly be a dividend of capital as of profits. To guard against dividends of capital in private corporations, there is always a provision in charters and general laws that there never shall be a dividend of any part of the capital stock of such a concern until it is wound up. So then in point of fact I should have said there was no doubt about it but for the fact that my friend from California, whose knowledge of law is at least quite as great as mine, thinks otherwise, that this was a clear provision against any division of any part of the capital, profits, or assets of the concern until this money shall have been repaid to the United States. But, however that may be, it is clear to my mind that that requirement of this act is one which will not bind the centennial board of finance in its character as a private corporation of stockholders, unless it assents to it; and my proposition, therefore, is to amend the bill by adding to the second section a provision, which of course it is perfectly easy for them to comply with, that they shall assent to the provisions of this act before they take the money.

It appears from what I have heard of the history of this transaction (and it ought perhaps to have been stated historically in connection with the action of the governor of Pennsylvania) that the money which the State of Pennsylvania has appropriated in aid of this enterprise has been exclusively invested in a permanent building which is to stand as a memorial building or an art-building for all time to come; and, therefore, the contribution that she has made has been merely the use of this building, which she has erected on these grounds, during the exhibition; and, as for the city of Philadelphia, I understand—and I shall be glad to be corrected if I am in error—that the total amount of her municipal contribution has been invested in a horticultural hall, if I am right in the description of the building, which is also her private property, and that neither of these buildings, constructed with the money furnished by taxing the people of Pennsylvania and the people of the city of Philadelphia, goes into the stock to which we are now asked to contribute, and therefore they will form no part of the assets out of which dividends can be made and no part of the property out of which the responsibilities of this corporation to exhibitors, or anybody else, can be collected.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. My colleague desires, of course, to be entirely accurate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think in relation to Memorial Hall there have been expended out of the appropriations made by the State of Pennsylvania and the city of Philadelphia $759,000, and for the Horticultural Hall $213,000 and something more, and that the entire contributions of the State and of the city were about two and a half millions. This leaves about a million and a half that they have contributed over and above these halls.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Out of the treasuries of the State and the city?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I so understand.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand exactly the reverse. It perhaps is not very material to the passage of this bill to offer authority that I thought I could rely upon as it was a person who ought to know; and if I did not greatly misunderstand him, (and I repeated the question two or three times, for I wished to know the real truth about this thing,) of all the money of the State of Pennsylvania contributed by its treasury—I am not speaking about the contributions of its inhabitants, who have been liberal in a very large degree, and have put to shame the citizens of other States I must say—of all the money belonging to the treasury of the city of Philadelphia, I understand no contribution has been made to this exhibition except for the purposes of the two buildings I have named, and probably the beautifying and fixing of the grounds which are to belong to these buildings after the exhibition is over.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire merely to say that in the summary reported by the board of finance it appears that this corporation has received a million dollars from the State of Pennsylvania and from the city of Philadelphia $1,500,000; and, in addition to that, it has received subscriptions of stock—I suppose mainly from Pennsylvania—to the amount of $1,852,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should be very glad to know that that is correct, and that this million and the other sums named here have been an actual contribution into the general assets of the corporation.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It is so printed there.

Mr. SARGENT. The proposition which I stated to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] was considered by the Committee on Appropriations, and I came to the conclusion which I expressed, as the result of those deliberations. I must confess that my confidence in the accuracy of that conclusion is very much shaken by the dissent of my friend from Vermont, whose ability and learning as a lawyer I appreciate. But I suppose it is well for us to understand exactly what we are doing; and I therefore venture to suggest, in addition, that as I understand it the construction which I have given is that which was put upon it by the board of centennial commissioners, acting under the advice of counsel, eminent counsel, having assured them that this was the construction to be put upon it, and that they would be able to carry out the original contract with their stockholders even if this bill passed; that the amount paid for their stock should be returned to them before any dividends of profits or before any other disposition of the fund. Now, if there were in this bill the provision, and it should be effectual, which obtains in most of the acts of incorporation in New England and many of the other States, unquestionably his construction would be correct; but it contains no limitation of that kind, and, therefore, it seems to me that, even if the board of centennial commissioners or this corporation should assent to this act, they would have no power, without a general meeting of stockholders competent to pass upon the question and authorizing them to do it, to surrender these rights contained in the original contract between the corporation and its stockholders. Even if this is so, and the proper construction of the act is that which I put upon it, and which is claimed by others so much interested, I do not see that for that reason I should vote against the bill. I am disposed to think that, if the Government is going to aid this exhibition at all, it ought to do it with a free hand. If a million and a half is the amount which we ought to contribute, we ought to give it without any after-thought or any expectation of recovering it back. I am disposed to let the persons who have put in their little means, their $20 or $50, receive their money back, or at any rate to receive such percentage of it back as the sale of the old materials of the exhibition may enable them to realize.

The former stages of this proposition were obstructed by myself and some other Senators to the full extent of our power. It is well understood by the Senate that for two or three years, when this proposition came up in different shapes, I contended as strongly as I could that the public faith ought not to be pledged by our legislation upon this matter to pay the expenses of this exhibition or to make good deficits which might accrue from the failure of the exposition to pay its expenses. I still think that I was right in the position which I then took. I did not believe that this was the best manner to celebrate a centennial occasion. At best, this exhibition, however great a success, will make but a ripple during this year. It will almost be forgotten the next year; it will not be remembered at all perhaps ten years thereafter. I was in favor of marking the passage of this era by some permanent monument, by some evidence of the appreciation of the men of this generation which should speak to future generations of the fact that a hundred years of great prosperity had accompanied the Republic, and that at the end of the hundred years we had preserved our unity, our liberties, and our institutions substantially as they were framed by our fathers. I did not believe that this could be done by a gathering, however large or magnificent, in a single city of the Union. I believe that, while there might be some temporary commercial advantages in a meeting of that kind and some pleasant expression of feelings of patriotism, it would do nothing to mark to the future the great appreciation which we feel and ought to feel of so interesting an occasion. Hence I did not believe that this ought to be a national movement. If citizens of any patriotic city or community, or the citizens of the United States generally, in their private capacities or organized as they saw fit, saw proper to have a celebration of this kind, I would not impede them in any way; but I did not think that that was a proper manner to employ the Treasury of the United States.

But, sir, this matter has gone on step by step. In spite of all the protestations which we were able to make, laws have been passed which give some countenance for this preamble; I do not believe, however, to the full extent which is claimed in this preamble. I think there is too much assumed here; and I am afraid, if this bill passes with this preamble, that they can come to us with more grace than they could at the present, or certainly with more than they have come at any previous time, and say to us, "You ought to make good any deficit in our resources." Take the fourth "whereas" here, and let me call the attention of the Senate to its gravity:

> Whereas the President of the United States, in compliance with a joint resolution of Congress, approved June 5, 1874, did "extend, in the name of the United States, a respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of other nations to be represented and take part in the international exposition to be held at Philadelphia, under the auspices of the Government of the United States," and as the governments so invited, to the number of thirty-eight, have so accepted such invitation, and many of them are making extensive preparations to embrace the courtesy so extended to them, thereby rendering proper arrangements for the coming ceremonies on the part of the Government of the United States a matter of honor and good faith; and whereas—

That is to say, we must make these proper arrangements; otherwise we violate our honor and good faith. If we fail to make adequate arrangements and others acting for us do make these arrangements, these men to whom we have given organized capacity and have countenanced by this present appropriation and by some other appropriations we have made, shall perform this work for us, then we are bound to make good whatever indebtedness they may incur; otherwise we are liable to imputations upon our honor and good faith.

I am not prepared to say that. While I am willing with open hand to give them the million and a half in consideration of the great exertions which they have made to make this exposition a success, I would do it on the one hand without an acknowledgment that it is because we are pressed to it by considerations of honor and good faith, involving subsequent considerations, and on the other without saying "We make this temporary loan and require that you shall take all the assets of this concern and put them into the Treasury of the United States in order to make good the amount which we have stingily doled out."

If this bill is to be amended at all, if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont is to be incorporated into it and it is to go back to the House of Representatives, I think it better to strike out this preamble; and I think the House would cheerfully assent to that, if I have the right to make that remark. I do not know that I would move to strike out the preamble unless the bill shall be amended in other particulars; but if an amendment is made to the bill requiring the action of the House upon it, then I desire to submit an amendment to strike out the preamble.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I desire to say a word only in reply to the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] The total cost of the centennial exhibition is $6,724,000. Of this sum $4,699,700 have been already raised toward it, and a million and a half is yet required. The State of Pennsylvania from her treasury gave $1,000,000. The city of Philadelphia from her treasury appropriated $1,500,000. There was a clause in the State appropriation act that one of the buildings—Memorial Hall—should be made so permanent, of so substantial a character, with such beautiful architecture, that it would be a monument to remain for all time, a monument of the progress which we have made in the century which has passed. Pennsylvania did not require that that building should belong to her; she did not put any restriction upon it at at all; but she supposed that it would be a monument of which every man, woman, and child in this broad country would be proud, standing there, one of the finest buildings in the world, in one of the finest and most beautiful parks that there is in any part of the world. It was to be a monument which she desired should remain there and not be torn down, as all the temporary buildings will be after the exhibition is over.

Two years ago, when this question was up, I assured the Senator from Vermont that I would not ask anybody to vote for an appropriation for the centennial exposition. Upon my assurance he withdrew his opposition to the bill then pending, and by the withdrawal of his opposition the bill passed. I regret that now there is a demand for an additional sum of money. That would not be, however, if there had not been a new constitution adopted by our State, soon after the time I made this pledge to the Senator from Vermont, which contained a clause preventing any appropriation for any such purpose from the State treasury. A million and a half of dollars to Pennsylvania would be nothing. I should be much prouder, if we had the power, to make that appropriation than to receive it from the Government of the United States. I would be glad if Pennsylvania, which was one of the foremost in the work of the Revolution and which has always conducted herself so as to be honored by all the other States, should be the host on this occasion to give her courtesies and hospitalities to every nation in the world. I am sure she would be proud to do so, and I am sure the present Legislature would gladly have made this appropriation of $1,500,000 if they could. Our whole real debt does not amount to $12,000,000, and a million and a half more would be nothing to us. I could point out hundreds of people, and I think thousands, who would be glad to have it said that Pennsylvania added that $1,500,000 more to her debt, for she will in seven or eight years be entirely without debt, but unfortunately some very radical, and perhaps very wise and good men put a clause into the new State constitution which prevents her from doing so.

I trust, if this money is to be given for this purpose, that we shall not amend the bill. Any amendment will send it back to the other House, where, in the present state of feeling, it may hang for months. If the appropriation is to be given, it ought to be given now. All the debts have been paid that have been incurred for this work. The buildings are nearly finished, and this money is necessary now because, unless you finish the buildings, they will not be ready when the different articles which are already shipped shall arrive at Philadelphia. I believe that the whole of the management there has been perfectly honest, perfectly economical, and that the conduct of everybody connected with it has been pure and patriotic and wise. It is not a question for Pennsylvania; it is a question for the United States. We are to assemble in Philadelphia after a hundred years have passed, after four generations have been buried with their fathers, after this country has grown from three millions of people to forty millions, and after her wealth has increased thousands and thousands of fold, when the intelligence and the culture and the education of this people have increased in a ratio far above all our physical wealth. Philadelphia will be the gathering-place for almost everybody who has gone from New England to the West. All that great western country has been peopled by persons who have migrated from the East to the West, and they will all come there, or a representative from every family will come, and there will be such a hand-shaking and such a kissing as has never taken place in any part of the world. I cannot imagine how anybody should hesitate a moment about contributing this little sum for a great family gathering. Who is there with children and grandchildren who does not like to bring them all together once in a while? And how much greater this family gathering will be than any other which has ever happened.

I regret that I have not been able to keep my word with my friend, the Senator from Vermont; and yet I have tried to do it, for I have not asked a man to vote for the bill, except just now I believe I am pretty near asking you all. [Laughter.] I am sure that his good heart and his great head will induce him again to withdraw his opposition and let the bill go through without any amendment at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I desire very much to vote for the appropriation of $1,500,000 to aid in the completion of this great exposition. I have heretofore refused to vote for any of the bills that have been passed on this subject, because I did not wish to complicate the Government of the United States with the management or with the responsibility in any way of the commissions or corporations under whose guidance it is to be carried on; but now that the work approaches completion, that the buildings have been erected, that we can see it has been done fairly, honestly, superbly I may say, I am willing to vote for the bill under consideration. The buildings are far greater in proportion, more beautiful, more extensive in every way, than the buildings erected for any of the great expositions of our age. Compared with the buildings that were erected at the Paris exposition they are more than twice the size and more complete in all their appointments; and so when compared with the exposition at Vienna, if I may judge from the measurements and the details that have been given to us, not having seen them myself. The people of the United States have already in their individual capacity answered fully the expectations of every one. All the States have been called upon. The people of Ohio have been called upon. The General Assembly of Ohio have, with great liberality, voted a pretty considerable sum of money to aid in the exhibition of the products of Ohio, and our leading citizens in Ohio have contributed with their money and with individual effort; and now, when the Government of the United States is called upon, which represents all the great powers of government, which collects in the way of taxation from the people of the United States between two and three hundred million dollars, to contribute to an exposition of its own industries, the industries of its people, to have a family gathering on the one hundredth anniversary of the birthday of American Independence, I should consider myself not exactly as mean, but as not doing my duty to the people I represent, to the whole people of the United States, if I was not willing to take from the Treasury of the United States that which we have demanded of the people of Ohio and of all the States, and of each individual citizen.

One million and a half to the Treasury of the United States is nothing compared with our resources and our greatness. When States and cities have contributed, when corporations all over this land have been called on to contribute, and when private citizens have contributed to the amount of thousands of dollars, it seems to me that we ought not to hesitate to make our contribution commensurate with our ability and our importance.

Therefore I have no hesitation in voting for an appropriation of a million and a half to complete this exhibition; but I do dislike this bill above all things, on account of the way in which it has been framed. I think myself if this bill were stripped of all the phraseology which raises and implies a doubt about our willingness to vote this million and a half, it would be more satisfactory to the people of the United States and to the House of Representatives. The provisos to this bill raise ambiguous questions of law. If they are construed one way, they are very unfair on behalf of the United States; if they are construed in another way, they are very unfair in favor of the stockholders in this corporation. I beg the attention of Senators to the language of the following proviso, which, like many other provisos in legislative bodies, has been put on in the nature of a rider, without consideration and without reflection; I read the proviso beginning in line 10 of section 1:

Provided, That in the distribution of any moneys that may remain in the treasury of the centennial board of finance, after the payment of its debts, as provided for by the tenth section of the act of Congress approved June 1, 1872, incorporating said centennial board of finance, the appropriation hereinbefore made shall be paid in full into the Treasury of the United States before any dividend or percentage of the profits shall be paid to the holders of said stock.

In other words, the intent of the person who first framed this proviso was to give the Government of the United States an advantage over other people who contribute to this exhibition. We give a million and a half of dollars; States give their proportion; cities give their proportion; individuals give their proportion; and now, when the United States is asked to give its proportion, we come in with a proviso, and say, "We will loan it until the exhibition is over; we will not allow these other people who have contributed their share to have any portion of the surplus after this show is over, but we will grab the whole of it before they get any of the assets." That is the intention but not the legal effect of the proviso, because by the addition of three or four words they have just reversed the object of the proviso. By inserting the words "or percentage of the profits" in the seventeenth line they have postponed the payment of the United States Government until all the capital stock is refunded, under the tenth section of the act, plainly, palpably to my mind, and I think the Senator from Vermont did not catch the point made by the Senator from California, or he would at once have perceived it. Now, read the language again. We are to be paid, it is true, according to the tenth section of the act which is recited, but how to be paid? "Before any dividend or percentage of the profits shall be paid to the holders of said stock." Now, what are the profits of this concern? Clearly, the profits are what remain after refunding not only the debts but the capital stock, and everybody knows that the addition of the words "or percentage of the profits" make it read: No payment shall be made to the United States until the capital stock is refunded, because the payment of the United States is only made out of any dividend or percentage of the profits after paying the stock. Thus by the addition of these words they have reversed it. If the United States stood as a simple stockholder of this concern it would be entitled to have the money refunded pro rata with other stockholders; but now, by the use of this language, vague and ambiguous language, framed and intended for another object, to give the United States an advantage, it has actually converted it into a provision that takes away from the Government the ordinary advantage of a stockholder.

It seems to me when the people of the United States are about to do a noble and a generous act it ought not to be subject to this double construction, and that this proviso ought to be stricken out. I believe the House of Representatives when they come to look over it more carefully would agree to its being stricken out, because I have no doubt that these provisions were added on in the haste and hurry of the last day of the discussion; and they would no doubt see that they have not accomplished the purpose they had in view. I have the tenth section of the act here, which expressly requires these commissioners to refund pro rata to the stockholders first after paying the debts. Then comes in this provision that out of the profits the United States shall be refunded its share of a million and a half. We all know that there never will be any profits, in a legal sense. We all know that the capital stock will never be refunded; and all any holder expects is to get a small dividend on his stock. The balance is gone and there will be no profits.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will the Senator read the tenth section?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask the Senator from California, who has it in his hand, to read it.

Mr. SARGENT. The tenth section is as follows:

That as soon as practicable, after said exhibition shall have been closed, it shall be the duty of said corporation to convert its property into cash, and, after the payment of all its liabilities, to divide its remaining assets among its stockholders, pro rata, in full satisfaction and discharge of its capital stock.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now there is an existing contract between this corporation and the stockholders. The United States cannot violate that contract without doing the meanest thing in the world. There is a contract made between individuals upon our invitation and a corporation created by us. We come in and say, "We will give you a million and a half to promote this common object, but we will deprive you of that advantage which our law gives you." It ought not to be done. It seems to me no proposition of that kind ought to be sanctioned. But that is not all. The second proviso is as faulty as the first. The second proviso is:

That the Government of the United States shall not, under any circumstances, be liable for any debt or obligation of the United States Centennial Commission or the centennial board of finance, or any payment in addition to the foregoing sum.

In other words, we are to have the benefit of special stockholders, according to the first proviso; we are to have some special advantage, but we are not to share a common liability. We are to have all the profits and share none of the liabilities. In other words, we are to be a special partner, yet we are not to be liable as a partner. It seems to me that this is not the way in which we should deal with this question. The people of the United States, the city of Philadelphia, the State of Pennsylvania, and the other States and corporations have given money liberally, heartily, with a free and open hand, to the amount of five or six millions of dollars to aid in this great exposition, and we are called upon to give a million and a half. Let us do it openly, manly, and in a generous way, just as they did. We can say very properly that this million and a half is the ultimate point to which we will go; that we will go no further, and thus give due warning to everybody that that is the extent of our contribution. The Congress of the United States has power to fix its contribution. We fix it and say we will not go beyond this point. Every individual can do the same, and the State of Pennsylvania can do the same. That we have the right to do. We may say when we give this million and a half that it is all we will give; but we ought not to stipulate for any particular favors or advantages, or exemptions or qualifications. It seems to me the bill does not employ the language in which such a gift should be given.

In regard to the second section, I do not think there is any objection to it; but I do not like the idea of introducing into every law of Congress a clause punishing a man by sending him to the penitentiary or requiring him to give a bond. It seems to imply that the men engaged in this great enterprise, who have been intrusted by corporations and States and individuals with $5,000,000, now when they may have to disburse a million and a half shall give a bond to the United States. These gentlemen, no doubt, can give bond; but is it worth while to go into that sort of legislation in an act of this kind, when individuals all over this country have placed their money at the disposal of these men—men of the highest character, men selected from all over the United States under an act passed by us? It seems to me it is belittling our own legislation. That is the way I look upon it. Why not have a penitentiary clause in the bill that if these men violate their bond or violate their obligation they shall be sent to the penitentiary for ten years or imprisoned for life?

Mr. SARGENT. And be forever afterward incapable of holding office.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, and be forever afterward incapable of holding office.

I had a notion to make the same remark the other day in regard to a bill pending before us where a penitentiary clause was stuck in a joint resolution that had no relation to it; but there was no objection to it. If a man violates his duty, he ought to be sent to the penitentiary; but I do not think it necessary to convert all our laws, especially an enactment connected with this exposition, into a penal statute requiring these men to give bond or to go to the penitentiary, or the like of that. I would like to have a plain simple appropriation of a million and a half of dollars without provisos or preambles to commit us or bind us at all. The whole of these whereases are of no account. The only effect is to extend our liability and involve us in pledges we may not be able to redeem. When we give a million and a half to this purpose we have done our share, no more and no less, and we can limit ourselves by saying we have given our mite and there is the end of it.

I hope, therefore, before this bill passes it will be stripped of its whereases, be stripped of its provisos, and contain a simple gratuity by the Congress of the United States, for the people of the United States, for our nation, our Government, for the national authority, to mix and mingle with the contributions given by the States, by individuals, by cities, and by corporations, and let the whole country join together, in all its corporate and incorporate capacities, as individuals and corporations, in this great exposition of American industry.

I hope the people from every part of our broad land will flow to the city of "brotherly love." I hope even that the sentiment represented by that name "brotherly love" may extend itself to every man, woman, and child in the United States of America, that the feelings that were inspired by the revolutionary events of 1776 may animate us all, unite us, blend us together into one family of forty millions of people; and from that time forward unto the end of time we will look upon all the events of our history, whether good or evil, with a kindly feeling, and contribute, in the future at least, every one of us to promote the common good and the general welfare.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I certainly agree with the opinion expressed by the Senators from California and Ohio, that the true way for us to make this appropriation would be by a bill appropriating unconditionally a million and a half of money to this exposition. It is no more, no less than we ought to do; but the bill is not before us as an original proposition, and it seems to me that we should be doing damage, unless it is really essential, by amending this bill in any respect.

One objection to the bill stated by the Senator from California is the preamble. I agree with him that I would strike it out as an original proposition; but I do not think the preamble does any particular injury. It is in bad taste; it is cumbersome. There is, if it stood alone, an implication that we may be bound on the ground of courtesy to foreign powers to go to still greater expense; but then we find in the body of the bill this provision, which neutralizes that suggestion of the preamble:

That the Government of the United States shall not, under any circumstances, be liable for any debt or obligation of the United States Centennial Commission or the centennial board of finance, or any payment in addition to the foregoing sum.

It seems to me that that neutralizes the preamble. Therefore, as it would injure the great object that we all have in view, I would not amend the bill by striking out the preamble.

Then the Senator from Vermont suggested that it was necessary to amend the bill by adding a proviso that the centennial board of finance accept this million and a half of dollars on the pledge that the money shall be returned if it is in their power to return it.

Mr. SARGENT. Will my friend allow me a moment? I would like to inquire of him, as a lawyer, if that provision would not be inoperative provided it impaired the rights of stockholders? What authority have the United States centennial commission or the board of finance to impair those rights? Must it not be done by a general stockholders' meeting, if it can be done at all?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suppose the Senator from California is certainly right, that there is no efficacy in the amendment suggested by the Senator from Vermont, provided there is at this time a contract between those who have contributed and the centennial board of finance that they are to be paid. If that is so, we cannot by any legislation here inject our claim to be a prior one to theirs; neither do we want to do it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask the Senator if the tenth section, which has been read, does not itself make it incompetent for the Government to do that?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think it possible it may have that construction. The tenth section, as I heard it read, is that after their assets are converted into money it shall be used in paying their debts and in making a dividend to the stockholders.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey a question. I should like to inquire if the corporation receiving this money could possibly receive it on any other terms than those expressed in the act, and, therefore, if they would not be bound to the extent of any obligation we should impose upon them for the use of it, and to the results of that use, which are expressed in the grant?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There certainly would be an honorary obligation upon them, whether there would be a legal one, in their accepting it on those terms. There might be something in that.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire whether any words can be put into this bill that would furnish the Government any means by which they could enforce it any more than now.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suppose that if the Government of the United States had a clear contract with this board of finance which did not interfere with any pre-existing contracts the Government of the United States might by judicial proceedings protect that fund and recover it.

Mr. DAWES. Suppose we offer this board of finance a million and a half of dollars upon certain terms, and they take it upon those terms. Whatever obligation could exist would exist and whatever power to enforce that obligation that could be created by statute would exist now?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am by no means certain that the view of the Senator is correct, and I certainly should have agreed with him if I had not found several Senators around me for whose opinion I have great respect differing from the view expressed by him. But it is very clear, Mr. President, that as we would give this money, and the subject is new to us, we do not want to incumber it by the amendment suggested by the Senator from Vermont; and as there is no particular evil flowing from the preamble, as it is neutralized by the act, I hope we may just pass this bill as it is.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not rise to discuss this subject in its general aspect, but simply to endeavor to correct a misapprehension into which the Senate may probably fall from what has been said in regard to the ownership of these buildings. Agricultural Hall has been paid for partially out of the money appropriated by the city of Philadelphia as well as from funds received from stockholders. It belongs to the association and will be disposed of as the permanent property of the organization. Memorial Hall, which was built by the money appropriated by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, $1,000,000, as has been stated by my colleague, is to be used as a general art building in all time to come. It is to remain there. It was a nucleus around which this organization grew up. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania gave impetus to the work by her gift of a million dollars, and around that the stock subscriptions or contributions of the city of Philadelphia have grown, so that there is nothing in the allegation that these buildings belong to the city of Philadelphia or to the State of Pennsylvania.

Permit me to say in reference to the action of the governor of Pennsylvania, though I am not properly his defender, that when he made the communication to the President of the United States to which reference has been made there had been private stock subscribed equal to about $2,000,000. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania had subscribed a million dollars. The city of Philadelphia had subscribed a million and a half of dollars. Here were four million and a half of dollars actually subscribed, and this was equal in amount to the whole cost of the buildings for the Paris exposition. Upon this state of facts was the governor not warranted in giving the information that he did give to the President of the United States, under which the proclamation was issued? Can there be fault found with him for doing that which the act of Congress plainly contemplated he should do? If the work has grown under the hands of the gentlemen who have charge of it, if it be now not only in dignity, in magnitude, and in its prospective results more than a State work, and assuredly a national work, it is the more reason that we should help it from the difficulty into which it has fallen by reason of the financial troubles that are upon the country. Its appearance here for aid is not by reason of the negligence or want of energy on the part of those who have had charge of the organization.

But one thing more and I have done—the construction of this bill as it comes from the House, and what those in charge desire should be done with the bill. Can it be that this bill is to be so construed that the Government of the United States shall, without any word of mortgage, loan, or lien in the bill, and without the consent of the individual stockholders, put its million and a half in the room of the $2,250,000 subscribed by the stockholders? In other words, shall the Government say to the stockholders, We, without your consent, take from you 72 per cent. of the dollar that you have given toward the erection of these buildings? That is the practical effect of the construction placed on the bill by the Senator from Vermont. It is in effect to take away from these stockholders $1,500,000 of their stock without their consent.

The amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the second section only provides for the consent of the board of direction and not for the consent of the stockholders. The consent of the stockholders cannot be obtained. It is impossible to obtain it in the nature of things. It would delay the progress of the work. The bill would be practically a dead letter. Hence that amendment it seems to me is for two reasons inopportune and ought not to be placed on the bill: first, because the true construction of the bill is against it, in this view it is unnecessary; second, because it would delay and possibly defeat the passage of the bill. I hope that the bill will be passed just as it came from the House, without amendment or alteration.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I have reached the conclusion, having waded in so far, that to go back would be more dangerous than to go forward, and I shall accordingly, notwithstanding all my record is against the previous enactments in relation to this matter, vote in favor of this bill. I had on a former occasion some reluctance to inaugurating this style of an international celebration. I believe it might have been better to have had the celebration take place in every city and town of our whole country, where all might take part. I also believed that if we were to have a grand celebration at any one point it would have been far better to have called it a national celebration, especially of the American people, instead of international, thinking and believing that as many foreign nations would come to a national celebration as to an international one, and that we should thus avoid giving any offense to other nations with different political institutions arising from sending them out invitations to attend what they might regard with somewhat different feelings from those entertained by our people as to the propriety of celebrating the hundredth year of a republic. In any event we should have had a grand celebration of our own.

But, Mr. President, all that has passed by, and we must accept of the situation and do the best we can. It will be conceded, I think, by all that the buildings that have been put up are creditable to the country. The celebration is to take place, and the only question is now as to what is our duty in the premises. It seems to me that we cannot afford to shirk all duty in a celebration of this character. Foreign nations have already contributed liberally and several States have also contributed to the success of the coming exhibition. The United States Government will be handsomely represented there, the War, the Navy, the Interior Department and the Smithsonian Institution will make important contributions, and we may very properly be asked to do something.

I know that my friend from Ohio says that he would prefer to make this appropriation in an open and manly manner, as Philadelphia and Pennsylvania have done. If they have made their appropriation in an open and manly manner, as I do not dispute, I should have liked very much to have copied their manner. They have provided that a building, which is to cost nearly a million of dollars, shall remain permanently for their future benefit. If I could have had my way, I would have made an appropriation for a building there in the shape of a national musuem of national history and of art, and in such form, made of iron and other fire-proof materials, that it might have been brought to this city at the close of the celebration; for I feel sure that the contributions of the United States to the centennial celebration are of so interesting a character that they will immediately require a suitable place where they can be stored for all future time. It will be such a show as we shall have great reason to be proud of and to preserve. Therefore I would have preferred to have copied the open and manly manner of Pennsylvania and Philadelphia in the construction of a building that we might have removed to this city at the close of the celebration; but it is too late for that purpose at the present time.

In relation to the constitutional question, let me say this: We have heretofore made appropriations for an international exhibition at London, at Paris, at Vienna, and all at very considerable cost, authorizing our own national vessels to be used in the transportation of the articles to be exhibited. It is therefore too late to say, if we can make these appropriations for an international exhibition abroad, that we have no power to make such an appropriation for an exhibition here at home. This is to be our centennial celebration of American Independence. This central point of Philadelphia is to form the chief figure in that centennial celebration. It appears to me that we cannot afford to make a sorry figure of shirking all expense at that time. The President, as he was authorized to do, has invited foreign guests, and we must be at home. I, therefore, am in favor of such an appropriation as will not suffer our name to be disgraced on the occasion; and having given out the invitations, as we have done, and which have been accepted by at least thirty-eight of the most considerable nations upon the earth, who will come there with their great abundance of articles for show and exhibition, I think it is eminently proper that we should do something, if not quite so much as Philadelphia and Pennsylvania.

But, beyond this, I am in favor of the general purposes of this exhibition, because it is to work to the profit of the workingmen, of the artisans, of the whole United States. When our commissioners to the Paris and other foreign exhibitions returned they brought home reports of all that they saw abroad. They were printed, so far as the Paris exposition is concerned, in six large octavo volumes, and they were of almost priceless value. When this exhibition shall have met, and the examination shall take place in relation to all the products of agriculture, of the arts, and of manufactures, and all other articles that will be contributed for exhibition, it will be found that those who are to make the most solid improvements therefrom and derive greatest benefit will be the workingmen and the skilled artisans of the United States. It will be their exhibition. I am therefore for it.

Mr. MCCREERY. Is it in order to offer an amendment at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ALLISON in the chair.) The amendment of the Senator from Vermont is now pending.

Mr. CONKLING. But another amendment is in order.

Mr. MCCREERY. Then I will offer a substitute. I move to strike out all after the title of the bill and insert what I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky offers a substitute, which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out the bill, including the preamble, and insert:

That it be recommended to the people of the United States to assemble, on the 4th of July next, in such numbers and manner as may be convenient, in their respective cities, towns, villages, neighborhoods, or wherever they may be, publicly to testify their joy at the one hundredth return of that auspicious day, by suitable eulogies, orations, and discourses, or by public prayer and such religious exercises and ceremonies as may be appropriate to the occasion and sanctioned by their own consciences.

Mr. MCCREERY. Mr. President, it will be observed at a glance that the propositions of the bill and the substitute are widely different. They seek to reach the same end, but by methods of an opposite character. There is an entire change of programme. It is to the merits of this change that I shall offer a few remarks. Whatever may be the fate of the amendment here, an enlightened public opinion will decide that in every essential and in every particular it is more in harmony with the spirit of our free institutions than the novel and expensive machinery which it proposes to supersede.

The amendment is national. It calls for a celebration commensurate with the length and breadth of the Union, or with the wide world over, whithersoever our countrymen may have wandered. The American citizen, wherever he may be, on the land or the sea, is invited to hail with joy the one hundredth anniversary of American freedom. Rejoicings will welcome the dawn on our eastern shores and never cease until the islands of the western ocean shall join in the strain. The hills of Canada will echo the shouts, and the cattle-thieves of Mexico will flee from their stolen herds and hide themselves in caves or thickest chaparral. Let us all take a hand in this great celebration.

The bill before the Senate is sectional, and sectional favors or sectional wrongs, if persisted in, may produce disgust, alienation, and enmity. The sad, the bitter experience of the past is sufficient of itself to stifle all sectional views and to rally us as one man around the motto of "equal rights to all and exclusive privileges to none."

But it is worse than sectional; it is local. The appropriation, large as it is, is confined to one spot. Among all the cities of the United States a single one is selected to receive an appropriation or subsidy for an object in which all are equally interested. But it is worse than local; it is individual and personal. The donation goes not to the city of Philadelphia, but into the pockets of the stockholders of the centennial exhibition. There is no pretense that they are paupers, and, if they were, provision should be made by their own municipal authorities. There is no proof that they will lose anything upon their investment, and, if they do, they ought to share the fate of other speculators who have made unfortunate ventures. It must be that this donation is asked to guard against that contingency, as the governor of Pennsylvania more than two years ago informed the President that their means were sufficient to erect suitable buildings. How then can that joint-stock company have the audacity to ask the Congress of the United States to reach their hands into the Treasury and withdraw fifteen hundred thousand dollars, to be presented as a gracious gift to that corporation, and I contend it will turn out to be nothing else, when the executive of Pennsylvania has officially announced to the President that their means are sufficient already? There is something so supremely ridiculous in the statement that, although we are confronted by the fact, we scarcely recognize the reality. It is believed that the history of the legislation of the civilized world might be searched without finding a parallel, and that, too, when the people are laboring, suffering, and groaning under the weight of oppression which is taxing them to the utmost of their energies and capacities. How sublime the patriotism, how wonderful the magnanimity, how gushing and self-sacrificing the generosity which halts not to inquire after facts, but presses eagerly forward to pour a princely offering into the coffers of a private corporation, although the highest and best-informed authorities in the land have proclaimed under their hands and seals of office that the company had already provided the means to carry out their enterprise!

If a statement made by the governor of the Keystone State and indorsed by the President is to be questioned, where may we look for truth? Those who view the proclamation in the light of a treaty and deduce an obligation from its terms, have read the paper to little purpose, as, instead of incurring, it is a positive guarantee against, obligation. The means have been provided. To this hour the Government is free from complication of any character; and I have an abiding hope, notwithstanding the heavy pressure, that the Senate of the United States will rise to the dignity of its earlier and better days, and, indignantly spurning all extraneous and misleading influences, will vindicate the Constitution of the country and the rights of the people.

I will not ask the Senator who reported this bill what amount of testimony was adduced before the committee in support of the claim. It might be embarrassing to him to have to say that no sworn statement was made, and that no affidavit, deposition, or other evidence was read, showing that the company needed any appropriation whatever. I have seen the orphan meekly retiring from this Capitol without a cent when it had been established by proof clear as noonday that under the order of one of your officers her house and her home had been destroyed. That economy went to the very verge of injustice. But she was a helpless exile from her birthplace, and may not be compared to a corporation with a cash capital of many millions. She had no money to pay the press to urge her claim and no organized lobby to plead her cause.

It is said that Alexander, during his migratory and victorious tramp, met a man who robbed the rich in order that he might be able to give to the poor, while we—I leave the sentence unfinished.

But the paramount advantage of the substitute over the bill arises from the fact that it invokes the general co-operation of the religious element, an element which, when sincere, has my profound respect and veneration. Counterfeits there are; but the genuine coin shines only the more brightly in consequence. Hypocrites and knaves may debase and degrade themselves, but they cannot defile the altar nor shake the all-pervading hope and faith in the goodness and mercy of God. Let prayers ascend from ten thousand churches and let ten thousand choirs sound their highest and sweetest notes in anthems of thanksgiving and praise.

I shall pursue the contrast between the commemorative characters of the two plans or propositions submitted in the bill and the substitute. Will there be anything at the Philadelphia exposition calculated to revive the memories of the revolutionary struggle? If old Stephen Hopkins, with his broad-brimmed hat and his palsied limbs, could rise from his grave and visit it while in full blast, he might mistake it for an Oriental bazar, but he would see or hear little that would remind him forcibly of what transpired one hundred years ago. Will the gay throngs of pleasure-seekers who glitter and flit like butterflies through Fairmount Park ever stop to think of Valley Forge, the Heights of Abraham, and King's Mountain, and Ticonderoga, and the great Jehovah and the Continental Congress, and the crossing of the Delaware, when the frozen ground was dyed red with the blood that trickled from the naked feet of the soldiers?

The legal mind of Mr. Evarts will be apt to overlook these and kindred topics; but what a field for the five thousand Fourth-of-July orators called into service by the substitute! Their eloquent recital would draw the briny tear from many a gray-headed sire and from many a bright-eyed boy, who will never pass the guarded gates of Fairmount Park. Will you chill their enthusiasm and crush out their inspiration by leaving them to brood in silence over the melancholy reflection that, although they are unable to join in your festivities, they may at least go to work to pay the expenses?

A practical observation now and then is not out of place even in this Senate of the United States.

The last and greatest advantage claimed for the substitute is that it costs nothing. Reflecting men of all parties are looking with anxiety and apprehension and with dread foreboding upon the financial situation of the country. They stand bewildered and appalled at the contemplation of our national, State, municipal, and individual indebtedness. How can we extricate ourselves from the difficulties and embarrassments that surround us? If it is done at all, it must be accomplished by the unwearied toil and by the productive energy of the people. They believe that they are taxed enough already, and from one end of the land to the other the cry is for reform, for curtailment of expenditure, and for an economical administration of affairs. They are in earnest. Let no man mistake their purpose. Credit Mobilier passed the Congress of the United States. The authors and supporters of that measure no doubt believed, as they professed to be engaged in a great work, that they would escape animadversion; but where are they now? Gone! and the places which knew them may know them no more forever.

I am not a candidate for a third term; I have no political aspirations, no personal or selfish ends to subserve; and from that independent position, I ask Senators to beware how they trifle with the important interests intrusted to their keeping. We are the trustees of the people, the guardians and custodians of their hard-earned treasures. Let our conduct be such that an upright chancellor would approve our action.

The newspapers have been industriously circulating the idea that disgrace would follow the failure of this appropriation. That song were as well unsung, when it falls on the ears of men steadfastly resolved honestly to discharge their duty.

What sort of government shall we have if all checks and all limitations to power are removed? Labor will be the prey of capital; the weak will be the victims of the strong; and despotism dark as night and cold as winter will spread its icy pall over the land. Where is the vigilance of Old Hickory to guard, and where is the shield of Douglas to cover, our Constitution in the hour of its peril, and save it from a construction which renders it as worthless and as unsubstantial as the baseless fabric of a dream?

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I am inclined to think that the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky is a good one. I like very well the idea of the Senator from Kentucky, and I will join with him if he will make his proposition a separate bill. I shall be very sorry to see any amendment made to this bill, but I like the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky and I will vote for it as a separate bill; for I cannot imagine anything better than to have a jollification in every village and in every town and in every city in this broad country on the coming Fourth of July. I will go down to Owensborough and see my friend in the blue-grass country, because I know he will treat me kindly and with great hospitality; he will treat me and everybody else who comes there with the hospitality which I know will be extended by Philadelphia and Pennsylvania to every one who goes there. The celebration at Philadelphia is to last for months; but why can we not have a village celebration everywhere, and have the fiddle and have the old contra-dance—none of your new-fashioned affairs, but the old dance which was danced in the time of the Revolution? I would have all that revived. I would during the coming year revive everything that was jolly; and I would make everybody happy that I could make happy; and I am sure that the Senator from Kentucky would be the most delighted of all delighted people to see everybody around him happy. He is not opposed to this exhibition, I am sure, but he believes that the people ought to have another opportunity—all the people. He says that will cost nothing. Does it not cost a day's work lost by everybody who goes to have a country frolic? Let him look at home; every laborer who quits his workshop, every mechanic who leaves his place of business, every merchant who leaves his store to go and have a jollification loses a day's work surely, and the money he spends besides. Why should they not have an opportunity to do so if they desire it? I am for giving everybody that opportunity. But that does not argue that we shall not have a great international exhibition where everybody is coming, and where it is our duty to treat everybody well when he does come. It is no longer a question whether people will come; the invitations have gone out, and the host must be prepared to receive his guests, and receive them in such a way as will not only be creditable to him, but to those he invites to come and see him.

I will only repeat, that after this bill is passed, as I trust it will be, if the Senator from Kentucky will bring up his proposition as a separate bill I will vote for it, and I will contribute out of my own purse to pay for part of it.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, my friend from Kentucky offers as a substitute for the centennial exhibition in Philadelphia a proposition authorizing the people of the United States to have orations and prayers on the Fourth of July. My friend seems to be under the impression that he has not a right to orate or to pray without an act of Congress. But he offers the further argument in favor of the prayers that they will cost nothing. If the prayers were to cost anything, I infer that my friend would be opposed to the prayers.

Mr. McCREERY. I would not appropriate anything for them.

Mr. MORTON. Now, Mr. President, we have got into a condition where the question of undertaking this exhibition has long passed. This is a national undertaking. It is under the control of two boards of directors, each of which was created by an act of Congress. The State of Pennsylvania has no power over it. We have passed two acts, first, creating a board of commissioners authorized to take charge of, conduct, and superintend this exhibition. We then created a corporation for the purpose of enabling people to take stock, and have established a board of financial managers; so that this thing is in its origin a national affair. I call the attention of the Senate now to the first act of Congress to show that it was inaugurated here. It did not start, as some suppose, with the State of Pennsylvania, but it started in this Chamber. I read the first act passed in 1871:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That an exhibition of American and foreign arts, products, and manufactures shall be held, under the auspices of the Government of the United States, in the city of Philadelphia, in the year 1876.

Here we provide that this exhibition shall be held under the auspices of the Government of the United States. It has been started, is being now conducted by officers appointed by the United States.

It is called an international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and products of the soil and mine. Do we mean to say that it shall be an international exhibition, that is to say, between nations of the Old World on the one hand and the State of Pennsylvania on the other? Is that what we mean by an international exhibition to provide for celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of American Independence by holding an international exhibition of "arts, products, and manufactures?" The United States started this thing, is now conducting it, has the exclusive control over it; and the simple question presented is whether we shall require the State of Pennsylvania or private citizens to pay the expenses? We have invited the nations of the world to come here, and thirty-eight have responded; some of them are now building houses upon the grounds; some of them have made appropriations to the amount of half a million dollars to make exhibition of their products, of their wealth; and the question is, after having done all this, shall we require somebody else to foot the bill?

If it was an original proposition the question might be different; but we cannot turn back now without being disgraced. The State of Pennsylvania has given a milion dollars; she has acted nobly. The city of Philadelphia has given a million and a half of dollars; and she has done well. Private citizens have contributed two millions and a half of dollars; they have done well. But still the managers lack a million and a half of dollars to carry out and conduct this great exhibition in a creditable manner; and now, after it has thus been commenced and the guests are present—foreign nations have already come by their agents and representatives, and their goods are in Philadelphia, and they are building houses and making all the preparations—we propose to say to them, "We will not pay the expenses."

As a matter of rhetoric it is all well enough to talk about the Fourth of July; it is well enough to talk about prayers. We have brought the nations of the world to our doors. The President has been authorized to invite them. They are coming. The contributions are not sufficient for a great national exhibition. When the government of England held the first world's fair, did it ask the counties of England, or the corporation of Manchester or of London to pay the expense? No; it was appropriated for by the British Parliament. When the French government invited the world to go to Paris, did it put it upon the corporation of Lyons or of Paris to pay the expenses or ask private individuals to do so? Not at all; but the government of France, regarding it as a great national affair, appropriated the money. When the Austrian government invited us and the rest of the world to go to Vienna, did they ask the corporation of the city of Vienna or private persons to pay the expenses? Not a bit of it. It was regarded as a national affair, and the whole amount was at once appropriated out of the treasury of the government of Austria. Here we invite the nations of the world to come; send abroad our invitation on the hundredth year of our national independence, a great national event, and we are willing to do so provided somebody else will pay the expense! It seems to me that a proposition of that kind needs only to be stated that it may be despised.

Mr. President, I look forward to this great exhibition with pride and hope. We shall show to the world in a way that we cannot by orations and by prayer-meetings, that do not cost anything, what progress has been made in one hundred years under free institutions. We shall show to the world what our country produces, what it is capable of. It will be the grandest invitation that has ever been extended to the world to come here. We shall present the grandest inducements for the best people of the Old World to come and live with us, take up their homes here. We shall show to them what we are. It will be the best advertisement for free institutions and for the industry, the skill, and the intelligence of the United States that ever has been made or that can possibly be made. I should like to give this million and a half, not considering it a donation, not considering it a gratuity, but making it as an appropriation to a legitimate and highly honorable and a highly useful purpose. I would not hamper it with the conditions that are in this bill. I am very sorry to see them; and I think there is one that is entirely illegitimate, because it is provided that this money shall be repaid to the United States after the debts of the company are paid "before any dividend or percentage of the profits shall be paid to the holders of said stock." We cannot make that arrangement without violating a contract. We have before created a corporation and have authorized men to subscribe stock, and we have provided by the tenth section of that act that after the debts are paid the proceeds of the property shall be divided pro rata among the stockholders. We cannot come in now and make the United States a preferred creditor or a preferred stockholder. If we were to treat it as a loan, that might be a different thing; but it is not proposed to make it a loan. If we are to become stockholders, we cannot become preferred stockholders. It is a violation of the contract with every man who has subscribed $10 to the corporation.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] proposes that the board shall consent to it. How can the board consent for the stockholders? Every lawyer knows that that cannot be done. Stockholders can only consent for themselves. But, Mr. President, I am willing to vote for this bill as it is for the reasons given by the Senator from Pennsylvania, believing that Congress hereafter will not hesitate to repeal that provision in this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ALLISON in the chair.) The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to add to section 2:

And only after the centennial commissioners and the centennial board of finance shall respectively file in the Treasury Department of the United States a resolution duly passed declaring their assent to the provisions of this act.

The amendment was rejected; there being on a division—ayes 12, noes 31.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREERY] as a substitute.

Mr. MCCREERY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the amendment be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is to strike out the preamble and all after the enacting clause of the bill, and in lieu thereof to insert:

That it be recommended to the people of the United States to assemble on the 4th of July next, in such numbers and manner as may be convenient, in their respective cities, towns, villages, neighborhoods, or wherever they may be, publicly to testify their joy at the one hundredth return of that auspicious day by suitable eulogies, orations, and discourses, or by public prayers and such religious exercises and ceremonies as may be appropriate to the occasion and sanctioned by their own consciences.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COCKRELL, (when his name was called.) I am paired in part with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHRISTIANCY.] Were he here, he would vote "nay" on this amendment, and I should vote "yea."

Mr. DAVIS, (when his name was called.) On all questions connected with this bill I am paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] If present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay" on this amendment.

Mr. NORWOOD, (when his name was called.) On the main question I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. GORDON.] I suppose he would vote "nay" on this amendment, and I decline to vote.

The call of the roll was concluded.

Mr. ANTHONY. My colleague, [Mr. BURNSIDE,] whose name was not answered to, is detained at home by severe illness in his family.

The result was announced—yeas 12, nays 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Cooper, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Kernan, Key, McCreery, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, Whyte, and Withers—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dawes, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, English, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Spencer, Wallace, West, Windom, and Wright—45.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bogy, Burnside, Christiancy, Cockrell, Davis, Gordon, Hamilton, Howe, Johnston, Kelly, Logan, Merrimon, Norwood, Saulsbury, and Sherman—15.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it in order at this time to move to strike out the preamble?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to strike out the preamble. The preamble is inaccurate both in regard to dates, and in certain respects, as I construe it, in regard to facts. As we get the substance of the thing without this long recital, I think it quite important that the preamble should be struck out.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I hope we shall not make any such amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to amend the bill by striking out the preamble.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If that motion should prevail, of course it would involve the necessity of sending the bill back to the House of Representatives. It is not a material part of the transaction, any way. If it were an original proposition, I should be in favor of striking it out; but as it is immaterial in its effect on the bill, I trust it will not be stricken out. I trust, therefore, the motion will not prevail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to strike out the preamble.

The amendment was rejected, there being on a division—ayes 18, noes 34.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, if we are joining ourselves to a corporation here and are to be regarded as one of the stockholders, I desire to have the bill amended. Let us look at it:

Provided, That in the distribution of any moneys that may remain in the treasury of the centennial board of finance after payment of its debts, as provided for by the tenth section of the act of Congress approved June 1, 1872, incorporating said centennial board of finance, the appropriation hereinbefore made shall be paid in full into the Treasury of the United States before any dividend or percentage of the profits shall be paid to the holders of said stock.

I disagree with the Senator from Vermont in regard to the meaning of the term "dividend," and therefore I desire to amend so as to make it read: "before any dividends to the stockholders upon their capital stock, or percentage of the profits shall be paid to the holders of said stock." After the word "dividend," in the seventeenth line, I move to insert "to the stockholders upon their capital stock." If this is a corporation, I do not want any dividends made until after the United States as one of the corporators shall come in. Therefore I desire to have the amendment made.

Mr. SARGENT. I shall vote against the amendment because it is in direct conflict with the tenth section of the act incorporating the centennial board. With the construction placed upon it by the Senator from Connecticut, made certain by this amendment, we violate the provisions of the original incorporation. The language in that section is too plain to be misunderstood, and certainly it conferred rights upon the stockholders, and the United States is bound in good faith to observe those rights. Section 10 provides:

That as soon as practicable, after the said exhibition shall have been closed, it shall be the duty of said corporation to convert its property into cash, and, after the payment of all its liabilities, to divide its remaining assets among its stockholders, pro rata, in full satisfaction and discharge of its capital stock.

I do not see how we are to come in at the present time with an amendment that takes away the right of these stockholders to receive their pro rata of the proceeds of the sale of the old property of the exhibition. That in itself is conclusive in my mind against the amendment.

Mr. KEY. I should like to ask the Senator one question. If the corporation accept this gift with this condition, will they not be bound by it?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir; provided the assent be given at a general meeting of the stockholders, who are the only parties who can release their rights.

Mr. KEY. Or by those representing the stockholders, probably.

Mr. SARGENT. No, I think not. I do not think there is a representation in that sense, or that there is anybody able to represent them; but such a meeting of the stockholders is impracticable. There are thousands of these stockholders putting in as low, I believe, in some cases, as a dollar, and from that to twenty dollars—large numbers of them. To get them together to give this consent is impracticable until another century shall have elapsed.

Mr. KEY. I take it that the stockholders are represented by the officers they elect.

Mr. SARGENT. I think not.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to say one word in regard to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut. That Senator referred to the position taken by the Senator from Vermont in justification or as the reason why his amendment should be adopted. The Senator from Vermont takes occasion to advise the Senate that they may be called upon for $2,000,000 or more hereafter. If that should be so, it will grow out of the fact that the centennial exposition does not yield a surplus of funds after paying expenses. I think that would be a very unhappy position if it were so; but upon the probability that it is so, on which my friend from Connecticut proposes his amendment, I submit to him that it is not of the slightest consequence to adopt his amendment. If there are no assets to be divided, and instead of there being anything to be divided we are to be called on for a still larger appropriation, he will see that it is not of the slightest consequence to insert this amendment.

The Committee on Appropriations had under consideration the construction which would be placed on this provision of the bill; and to say the best of it and the most of it, it is dubious precisely what the effect of it will be when you come to a division of assets, if assets are to be presumed. We would have been glad if it had not been here; but to send the bill back to the House of Representatives was, if not to defeat the whole object of the bill, at any rate to a very great extent to impair its beneficence. In that view, considering it somewhat immaterial, or at any rate in doubt, the committee thought it wise to report the bill back to the Senate and recommend its passage without amendment; because everybody can see who desires to favor this enterprise and to give it a generous support that you cannot afford to delay it one moment; and therefore I submit that no amendment which is not considered an exigency ought by any means to be put upon the bill.

I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut will not prevail, and I submit to him whether he deems it very important himself.

Mr. EATON. If the Senator from Vermont is right in supposing that this corporation will come knocking at the doors of Congress hereafter for another million and a half, then the amendment is certainly a matter of no moment; but I am not bound to say whether I think the Senator from Vermont is right or not in that conjecture. I propose to amend the bill as well as I can, so that if there should be anything left the Government of the United States may get its full share. I am not bound to say that I think it will be a success; I am not bound to say that I think or do not think that there will be hereafter another installment called for within two or three months. I offer the amendment in good faith.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, it looks as though it was a foregone conclusion that this bill shall pass just as it is, with all its inaccuracies and all its untruths. Everything that is false in the preamble we are to vote for. I do not propose to make an extended speech, for it would be folly for a man to waste his time in so doing on a question that is prejudged; but I owe something to myself, something to my State, and something to the country. I am opposed to this bill on principle. The very distinguished Senator from Vermont says that he doubted originally the power of Congress to appropriate money for purposes such as are described in the bill, but he has, upon examination, become satisfied that Congress possesses that power. I have upon examination become satisfied that Congress has no such power; and I go further, and say that there is not one single piece of legislation from 1800 down to to-day like unto this. The purchase of Louisiana has been alluded to; the grant of money to Lafayette has been alluded to, and fifty other things have been alluded to as being like unto this thing. They are no more alike than a chestnut horse is like a horse-chestnut. We owed a debt to Lafayette—a great debt. We paid it partly, as we paid pensions to our soldiers. We purchased Louisiana because the administration at that time believed that it was absolutely necessary, and there is not a Senator on this floor who does not know that Mr. Jefferson himself had great doubts with regard to the power, but he deemed that the occasion demanded the exercise even of a doubtful power.

This is making us a stockholder in a private corporation, legislating the United States into a private corporation as one of its stockholders. There never has been any legislation like it. But, sir, I will not go into the constitutional argument at length. I simply want to put myself right before the people. In my judgment Congress has no such power, and therefore I cannot vote for the bill.

Again, if I had no constitutional scruples, if I believed that Congress possessed the full power to pass this bill and appropriate this money, I would not vote for it to-day. I would not vote for it in view of the misery there is now in every State, in every county, in every city, in every township, in every hamlet of this broad land.

Sir, what is the debt of this country to-day; its national, its State, its county, its municipal debt? How much is it? It is more than $8,000,000,000. Sir, more than $700,000,000 a year is taken out of the hard earnings of the people of this country annually in the shape of taxes to pay the interest on their indebtedness. And yet Senators are called upon to add another million and a half; pæans are sung, Fourth-of-July orations are made, and grave Senators undertake to use offensive language on this floor and tell Senators it is mean, dishonorable, unjust not to do so and so. Such language is unworthy of this Senate. Is a Senator upon this floor mean, is he dishonorable, because he will not further load the people with debt? Sir, I scorn language of that character, no matter from what source it comes. I am here as one Senator to do my duty toward my State and the people of this country; and I am not to be told by any Senator that the people are disgraced by pursuing a course of action that the Constitution warrants and that common honesty induces me to pursue. Pay the debt; pay the interest upon your obligations; do not tax the people $730,000,000 annually; reduce your expenditures, not increase them; cut them down wherever you can; relieve the people of some part of this vast amount of taxation which hangs over them. That is my duty; and I am not to be told that either my country or my State or myself is dishonored because I pursue a course of this character.

We are told that the President of the United States was instructed by Congress to invite foreign powers here, and therefore we are dishonored if we do not give this amount of money. The President of the United States was instructed to invite foreign powers here under certain provisions of law, which were read by the Senator from Vermont; and if any of our public servants abroad in sending these invitations failed to do their duty, let us disavow their act, disavow it as the Senate of the United States ought to do, and not say because a foreign minister has failed to do his duty we dare not do ours. This was not a public act of the United States at all, because the whole world knew that the Congress of the United States had said that under no circumstances would it become liable for one single dollar of expense on this account; and yet we are told that the country is dishonored if the act of Congress is lived up to.

Mr. President, I do not quite understand that logic. It is logic learned in a school that I know nothing about. The Congress of the United States has said to the President of the United States that in extending his invitation to foreign powers this Government would not be bound for one dollar of the expenses attending this great exposition. Now we are told that if we carry out the law of Congress we dishonor the country. Sir, I hope I am as alive to the honor of my country as any other Senator on this floor. I trust that I shall be the last man, or among the last, to do anything to dishonor the fair fame of the United States. I do not well see how I am doing it when I stand upon the very legislation of Congress with regard to this very matter.

Mr. President, I did not intend to consume half the time I have occupied. I simply desire my own people—who are as deeply interested as any other people can be—to know my views. They are a manufacturing people, full of the arts, and they will be represented. My State has given money and her liberal and wealthy men have poured out their money for this exhibition at Philadelphia. I desire the people of my State to know that I stand upon the Constitution and by the laws of Congress as passed heretofore with regard to this very exposition, and therefore I have deemed it my duty to myself to say the little I have said on this subject.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, if I can have the attention of the Senate for a few moments I will give briefly the reasons why I shall support the measure now pending.

The preamble of the Constitution reads:

> We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

There are six great objects set forth in that preamble why the Constitution was made: A more perfect union, justice, domestic tranquillity, the common defense, the general welfare, and the grand purpose of securing the blessings of liberty to the framers of the Constitution, the people of the United States, and their posterity forever. I believe the Constitution carries out by apt and appropriate words every one of these great objects named. I believe that the purpose and design of the framers of the Constitution and of the States which in convention assembled ratified that Constitution are fully carried out in apt and appropriate words in the body of the Constitution. So believing, I have not been troubled with these doubts in regard to the constitutionality of this measure that seem to have troubled some gentlemen.

I regard this measure, Mr. President, as tending to form a more perfect union; I regard this measure as conducing to domestic tranquillity; and for these reasons, if I had no others, I would support it. But, sir, if I had a doubt in regard to it, when I look to the great train of precedents commencing in 1791 and winding up with the last precedent when the waters of the Mississippi had overflowed a whole country and put people at the point of starvation, when the grasshopper was infesting the Western States, I take it for granted that when we have these precedents, which have been voted for and advocated and approved by such men as Jefferson, Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, and the great master-mind of Mr. Calhoun himself, that doubt would be resolved in favor of the measure, more especially as I regard the end and aim to be accomplished as right in itself.

Mr. President, we have passed through a great war. That war, like all other civil wars, left some of its bad effects in the minds of the people. Passions were engendered, and it was difficult to allay those passions. I believe that those passions are gradually giving way and that the country is coming back to the condition of peace again. I have seen the good effects of an intermingling of the people North, South, East, and West. A few years ago a delegation from the Congress of the United States passed through the State which I have the honor in part to represent, from the Red River to the Gulf of Mexico, and wherever they went they were received by the people with all the hospitality that the people of the South are proverbial for; and when they returned home, even as far as Maine, they scattered the news wherever they went that the people of Texas at least were not the character of people which they had been represented to be, but that they were hospitable and sociable.

Mr. President, another great occasion did still more good than that. I should say in regard to that that it was the initial point of that intermingling of the people north and south which culminated last year in the addition of 300,000 to the population of our State, a large portion of whom came from the Northern States. When you had the centennials at Concord and Lexington and Bunker Hill last year, when men who went from the South to Massachusetts were received there with ovations by the people of New England, it showed the people of the South that when you struck the great heart of the people there was no animosity left, but that the soldiers who had worn the blue and worn the gray met like brethren, carrying out the great idea of Bayard Taylor, that

> The bravest are the tenderest
> The loving are the daring.

Mr. President, this at Philadelphia will be on a grander scale. There you will see not only people from the North and from the South, from the East and from the West, but people from all parts of the world will be there. Let the people of the great sections of this Union meet together; let them pass day after day and week after week together, knowing each other. The people of the North will see that the people of the South are men like themselves, having no malice toward the North on account of the war; and the people of the South will see the same of those of the North. This intermingling of the people will have a happy influence, in my judgment, and will do more toward breaking down the asperities of the war and bringing the people together than any other one thing.

That is the view I take of it; and if that be the result, even partially, the million and a half of dollars will be well spent. If we can form a more perfect Union, if fraternal concord between the various sections of the country can be promoted by this measure, the money will be well expended. But, sir, in an economic point of view, as was suggested by one of the gentlemen who have spoken, I would vote for it on that account. In the vaults of the banks in the North millions and millions of dollars are locked up. Capitalists cannot receive employment for their money; money cannot be loaned at any reasonable interest; while the people of the South, with their magnificent lands, their undeveloped country, cannot obtain money upon any terms. Let the people become better acquainted with each other and that want of confidence, which is the foundation and corner-stone of all the trouble that is in the country at this time, will disappear. Let the people of the North, South, East, and West come together and know each other, and it will go greatly toward restoring confidence; and, when confidence is restored again, peace and prosperity will follow.

These, Mr. President, are a few of the reasons that induce me to vote for the measure. I believe it will be a measure in the interest of peace. I believe it will be a measure in the interest of prosperity. I want to see this whole country prosper. I know that there are men who seem to regard anything which may be said by one like myself, who in the last great war wore the gray and fought under the banners of the confederacy, as not being sincere, as coming only from the lips. But, sir, I want the people of the Union to know that these gentlemen around me from the extreme Southern States have, upon every occasion, so far as the vote has been taken, voted for this measure, because they want peace, they want prosperity, they want that fraternal union which was designed by our forefathers when they framed the Constitution. I want to see—

> A union of States none can sever,
> A union of hearts and a union of hands,
> And the flag of our Union forever.

When I took the oath before the Vice-President, whose death was commemorated the other day in the Senate, to support the Constitution of the United States, I meant what I said. I meant that I want that Constitution carried out in full faith; I meant that I want the six great objects which are named in the preamble to the Constitution carried out to the letter; I meant that I want a more perfect Union; I meant that I want domestic tranquillity; I want justice established in every part and parcel of this great country; and I want the common defense provided for, and the general welfare provided for, and I want the liberties of the American people secured now and forever. Let us come together, burying our little sectional animosities, and act like one great people, standing together for the Union; and I say it, who fought against that Union to the best of my ability. Let us stand up together and remember that brave men following out their convictions, according to the way they believed the right to be, may differ. The man who cannot understand that on a difference of judgment honest men may differ knows nothing of human nature. Take a jury of the country, which has heard the same testimony and the same arguments, and received the same charge from the court. That jury go out, honest men, and they differ. Can you say that one part of that jury is honest and another part dishonest? When you submit a constitutional question to the highest judicial tribunal known to America, you find the court divided, as has often been the case recently in our Supreme Court. Can you say that one part of that court is honest and another part dishonest? And when you come to a great national question such as brought on the late civil war, I ask you as honest men can you say that one part, because they thought one way, were just and right, and the other treacherous and wrong? Sir, the causes which brought about the war commenced away back in the earlier portion of our history. A little thread will spring out from the main body of the Mississippi through the levee; it cannot be seen; but year after year it grows and gains strength; the water presses into it, and after a while a tremendous crevasse comes, and the whole country is flooded with a great waste of water. So it was in this late war. The conflict of ideas which ultimately resulted in civil war began years and years ago. A little thread just at the outset of the Union, was going on gathering strength, gathering power, gathering force, until after a while this conflict of ideas, this war of convictions, became a war in fact, and resulted in such a civil war as the world never saw before. Can you tell me that you were right and I was wrong? Can I say to you, sir, that I was right and you were wrong? I give to the men who followed their convictions according to what they conceived to be the right credit for honesty. I claim for the people of my country the same honesty. I believe that when the people of the North and the South, the East and the West, meet and talk together, when they again come together face to face and talk over these matters, it will do more to break down the asperities still outcropping from the late war than all things else put together. For these reasons I believe this centennial celebration, which will be on a grander scale than anything of the kind in America before, will have great good.

I have another reason for supporting this bill. I see gentlemen from the North almost solidly vote for this centennial exposition to celebrate the one hundredth anniversary of American Independence. Sir, when I remember that my ancestors on both sides were in the revolutionary war, struggling for the liberty and independence of the American Colonies; when I know that Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia sent out their full quota of men to that seven-years-long and desperate struggle, and that their sons fought for the liberty and independence of the States which had declared themselves free and independent on the 4th of July, 1776, I, as one of the descendants of the men who were in that struggle, claim the right to be represented at the centennial anniversary of their work. I claim, as one of the descendants of the men who gave to America her liberty, the right to be represented, and I claim for my constituents the same right. Sir, I represent in part the State of Texas, whose gallantry has never yet been questioned. Go to the Alamo. Unlike Thermopylæ the Alamo had no one left to tell the story. Go to San Jacinto which gave birth to a Republic. Go to Mexico; go into this late war; trace it from Gettysburgh to Arizona, and wherever you go you will find the gallant soldier of Texas baring his breast to leaden hail and the storm of shot and shell, never turning his back, but always to the front. I represent such men; and I say to the Senate of the United States that the men whom I represent entertain the same opinion that I do, and I am speaking the sentiments of the great and glorious State which I in part represent when I express the views that I have expressed here to-day. I shall vote for the bill for these reasons and many others that I might give, but which I do not think it necessary to enumerate.

Mr. President, I apologize to the Senate for speaking so long as I have. When I got up I had no expectations of occupying five minutes.

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, I had not designed entering upon this debate to-day, but finding it apparently the purpose of the friends of the bill to push it to a vote before we adjourn, I feel it due to myself and to the people whom I represent to express my dissent from this bill. I shall do it in a few brief words, so that the friends of the measure shall not be long delayed on my account in the consummation of their wishes.

I belong, Mr. President, to that class of now apparently antiquated men who revere the Constitution and regard its obligations as paramount to all others. I have listened with careful attention to the progress of this debate to find upon what constitutional provision its friends predicate this measure. I have listened in vain. True, my friend from Texas, who last addressed you, found in the preamble of that instrument the authority of law for the appropriation which is sought. But we have not in times past been accustomed to look to preambles for law and to preambles as defining what were constitutional rights and duties. I shall not, however, amplify this view of the subject, because I know that I speak but to the idle wind when I urge a constitutional objection as applicable to any measure which this body may think proper to pass.

I oppose the bill, however, not only on constitutional grounds, but because it is in my opinion contrary to the soundest principles of good government, to the interests of our whole people, North and South, to establish the precedent which will be established by the passage of this bill, that it is right and proper for the Congress of the United States to make an appropriation to a private stock company. I join issue with the distinguished Senator from Indiana who asserts in the most dogmatic phrase that this is a national enterprise. I point to its inception and to the various steps taken in the progress of the legislation of the country to the present moment to vindicate my assertion when I declare that it is naught but a private enterprise, a joint-stock concern for the purpose of making money. Its organization indicates it. The provisions which have been so repeatedly quoted here of the act under which it was organized go to show that like any other joint-stock company, a bank, a life insurance, a transportation, a railroad, or any other company, it makes provision for the issue of stock and ultimately when its purpose shall have been completed for the division of its assets among the corporators. In no essential particular does it differ from any other stock company, except in this one particular, that aid is asked of the Government of the United States to give it such a degree of nationality as will induce foreign people to send their contributions to the exhibition.

If time were allowed me, and if I were not conscious that I am trespassing on the attention of the Senate, I would go more elaborately into the act of incorporation and the subsequent acts of Congress on the subject to establish the position I have stated. My friends urge me to go on, but my own sense of propriety must make me cut short my remarks, and make them as brief as possible.

As the next point of objection to this joint-stock enterprise, I urge the disingenuous manner in which it has been brought before Congress. I do not charge any intentional deception in the matter; but if you will trace the history you will find that each application to Congress for recognition has been coupled with the assurance that it would involve no charge on the Treasury, and that not a dollar of appropriation should be asked for; and the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, in his remarks to the Senate, admitted the fact that he secured this recognition by Congress on the assurance that not one dollar should be asked from Congress in furtherance of this scheme. Now, when that recognition has been assured, after Congress has given it the recognition asked, coupled with this assurance, these same friends of the measure come forward and base upon that very recognition the claim that we shall pay one million and a half of dollars as a bonus to this joint-stock company to enable them to carry out their wishes and purposes. And the Senator from Indiana indignantly denounces any opposition to this measure as indecent, as dishonest, as mean, because, forsooth, as he asserts, the national honor is involved in carrying it through its glorious consummation in a manner worthy of this nation; and yet the distinguished Senator himself, in the very argument which he used to convince us of its nationality, brought forward, to my mind, most conclusive evidence that it lacked that essential element, failing in which his whole remarks fell to the ground. He quoted the example of other nationalities. He showed us that in England, in France, in Austria, in each and every case where a national exhibition of this kind had been inaugurated the expenses were paid by the government. And yet here we are charged with being mean for opposing an appropriation, when, if the meanness was perpetrated at all, it was by your Congress in the act passed to recognize the nationality of this enterprise, because they coupled it distinctly with the asseveration that, although you be invited here and asked to participate, you are to do it at your own expense, which constituted the essence of meanness that the Senator from Indiana so indignantly denounces. If there has been any meanness, it has not been on the part of those who oppose this measure, but it has been on the part of Congress who previously enacted the law under which you now claim recognition for this as a national enterprise.

National honor is said to be involved. Sir, it was well remarked by the Senator from Vermont that if we designed this as a grand national festival, to which we had invited the people and the world to come and unite with us in glorification of our republican institutions that they might see the degree of development which was possible under the beneficent influences of republican laws, it would have been more commensurate with our dignity as a nation, and with the hospitality to which we have invited them, to have imitated the example of England and France and Austria and footed all the bills of those who brought their products here to enable us to make this show and demonstrate what we desire.

But, sir, I find that I am wandering rapidly away into a line of remark which would cause me to occupy more time than I designed to do on the question now. I have merely one thing to say in conclusion; and that is that my hostility to this bill does not have its origin in any indisposition to celebrate in the most appropriate way this centennial anniversary of the birth of this Union. Sir, the State which I have the honor to represent had as much to do with our existence as a Union as any other State whatever. She has labored as strongly, her sons have fought as nobly, her statesmen have labored as assiduously and effectively in consummating this Union as those of any other State within the broad limits of the nation. Sir, her statesmen stood by the very birth of this Government, and with their firm hand steadied the reeling pillars of the infant State and fixed them on the firm basis of a free Constitution, and I venture to assert that Virginia will be the last to turn her back on that sacred instrument whose framing she bore so conspicuous a part in. But, sir, although it has been intimated that opposition to this bill from gentlemen hailing from the locality from which I come would be misinterpreted and misconstrued, I say that I would feel myself unworthy of the position I occupy here as a representative of Virginia if I were ashamed or afraid to meet any and every responsibility growing out of my position and to cast my vote on this floor in accordance with the dictates of my own convictions of right and propriety.

Mr. President, I will not longer delay the vote upon this measure by any remarks which I have to make.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on ordering the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. NORWOOD. It is now nearly half past four. I think I ought to make some remarks on this bill. It is too late to go on this afternoon, and I therefore, unless there is some other business to be presented, move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. NORWOOD. Does the Senate understand that I desire to make some remarks on this bill? I have already indicated to the Senator from Maine who has control of the bill the reasons why I do not desire to go on to-day. Do I understand by the vote that I am to be compelled to go on this evening?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senate to have declined to adjourn, leaving the Senator on the floor.

Mr. NORWOOD. Very well, sir, I ask for a division.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That call is too late, the result having been announced.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have understood that the Senator from Georgia who wishes to speak on this bill is unwell and feels himself unable to proceed this afternoon. If I am right in that understanding I think the fair courtesies that have always prevailed in this body should give him an opportunity to speak to-morrow; and so understanding the fact to be, I will venture to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

SENDING CARDS TO SENATORS.

Mr. MERRIMON submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be instructed to prepare and report an appropriate rule to the Senate to prohibit the annoyance of sending visiting-cards to Senators while the Senate is in session.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. HITCHCOCK, it was Ordered, That leave be granted for the withdrawal from the files of the Senate of the papers in the matter of the St. James mission.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened; and (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 9, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ARMY HORSES AND MULES.

Mr. BANNING. I ask unanimous consent to offer the resolution which I send to the desk, to get information from the War Department for the use of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be required to furnish the House with a statement setting forth the number of draught horses and mules used in the service of the United States Army in each and all its departments, together with the places where said horses and mules are in use, the average cost per head of said animals, and the places where they are purchased; also, a statement of the cost of mounting the regiments of cavalry, naming the regiments (if any) most expensive to mount and remount.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I object, upon the ground that it will take a very large force of clerks all the balance of the session to furnish that information.

Mr. BANNING. In answer to the gentleman's objection I will say that if it will take a large force of clerks all the rest of the session to furnish that information I think it better we should find that out, and have these Departments better regulated, so that when called upon they can give us the information which they ought always to be ready to give.

Mr. THORNBURGH. If the Department had the force to do it I should not object, but I do not think they have.

Mr. BANNING. This information is very important.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I do not know that it is so important as to require a large force of clerks to be devoted to furnishing it.

Mr. BANNING. It is very important. I am told the number of draught horses and mules now used in the service of the United States Army is over twelve thousand, and I suppose the gentleman from Tennessee does not want to know if that be true.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I do not want to have all the time of the clerks of the War Department taken up in procuring that information. I adhere to my objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at fifteen minutes past twelve o'clock, and the regular order is the calling of committees for reports of a public nature.

SALE OF LANDS AT VINCENNES, INDIANA.

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 192) authorizing the sale of certain lands at Vincennes, Indiana, with the recommendation that the bill as amended do pass.

The bill was read. In its preamble it sets forth that the United States heretofore acquired for debt, through the intervention of trustees, certain real estate in and near the city of Vincennes, Knox County, Indiana, consisting of about eighty acres of land, more or less, survey No. 5, township No. 3 north, range 10 west, second meridian, together with the half of lot No. 1 and the whole of lot No. 8 of Harrison's addition to said city of Vincennes, commonly called "the steam-mill tract," or "Hall Neilson property;" and that the Ohio and Mississippi Railway Company, the Evansville and Crawfordsville Railroad Company, and the Indianapolis and Vincennes Railroad Company have severally placed their tracks, switches, and certain building on said land while the title to the same was disputed. And, as it is desirable that said companies shall continue to occupy such portions of said land as may be necessary for the successful operation of their railroad lines, the bill therefore provides that the Solicitor of the Treasury, if in his judgment the interests of the United States require it, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may sell, or cause to be sold, at private sale, for not less than its appraised value, to be ascertained under the direction of the Solicitor of the Treasury, to said companies so much of the same as may be required for their tracks, switches, shops, and other railroad purposes, provided that the aggregate amount so sold shall not exceed one-third of the whole of said land, and provided further that the remaining portion of said real estate may be sold under existing laws as may be convenient and desirable.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

After the word "laws," in the last line, insert the words "in such parcels."
Add to the bill this proviso:
That this act shall not prejudice any adverse claim or right to the said lands.

Mr. PAGE. I make the point of order that the bill contains an appropriation or disposition of the public lands, and should have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. PARSONS. I think it does not make an appropriation of the public lands. It remits the matter to the consideration of the Solicitor of the Treasury, by and with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. I do not see that it appropriates anything.

Mr. HOLMAN. There was a bill I believe passed on this subject in the last Congress.

Mr. PAGE. I submit that the point of order is not debatable. I ask the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide the point of order in a moment, after he has had time to examine the bill. [After a pause.] In the judgment of the Chair, the point of order is not well taken. This bill proposes in no sense whatever a grant of land, but only provides for a sale of land in a certain event, the money received to be of course the property of the United States; and it makes no difference that the authority conferred upon the Government is in a certain event to sell to persons or parties named. In the judgment of the Chair, as the bill involves no grant of land in any proper sense, the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. PAGE. It involves a disposition of the public lands.

The SPEAKER. So may any bill for the sale of the public lands.

Mr. PAGE. The rule applies to any bill making an appropriation of money or a disposition of the public lands.

The SPEAKER. An appropriation of the public lands. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to ask the gentleman reporting the bill whether this sale is to be at public auction?

Mr. PARSONS. No, sir. I would answer the gentleman that the object of the bill is to give to the Solicitor of the Treasury, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, the right to sell at private sale.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that will not be done. The bill of last session was for precisely the same purpose, and was amended by the House.

Mr. PARSONS. This land is to be sold subject to appraisement; it is not to be sold for less than the appraised value.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the principle of public sale will be adhered to. It seems to me it would be much better for the officers of the Treasury, who are required to take charge of this sale, to have it at public auction. I do not understand exactly the object of this bill. A bill was passed at the last session for the same purpose, which, I presume, was found to be insufficient; but that bill was amended in the House so as to require the sale to be at public auction, after appraisement. I ask that this bill be so amended as to require the sale to be at public auction upon such notice as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield for that amendment?

Mr. PARSONS. I do not.

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill affects a portion of the Government lands in the State of Indiana, and I shall therefore have to insist that it shall not pass, so far as my vote is concerned, without the amendment I have indicated. I am not willing that railroad corporations shall obtain by any means an improper purchase of lands from the Government. Let them come in and compete for this property as our citizens must do.

Mr. PARSONS. The objection of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will be found hardly tenable when you consider the fact that this bill remits the subject to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the Solicitor. If the interests of the United States require it, they are to have the right to sell those lands at private sale. To favor one class of people over another is certainly not designed by this bill. It simply gives the right to those who have already improved this land to purchase that which may be necessary for securing their improvements. Nearly twenty years have elapsed since the improvements were begun, and they have already made improvements upon that land in the pursuit of their enterprise, in the erection of a great public highway, which should in fact entitle them to the possession of the ground itself. They have attempted condemnation under the laws of the State, but have found no one to whom to pay the money which had been decreed as the value of the land. They, therefore, ask simply to be permitted—and the Committee on Private Land Claims after full consideration have reported a bill for that purpose—to purchase this land at its appraised value.

The right to purchase this land is not to be given to them unless in the discretion of the Secretary and Solicitor it is necessary for the interests of the United States. And they are limited in the amount of their purchase. I understand this land is embraced within the corporate limits of Vincennes. It will be divided into lots and parcels, for if sold in bulk it would be sold at a sacrifice, even if sold at public sale after due advertisement. I understand, if I may be permitted to say so, that the objection to the passage of this bill comes from private persons who are anxious to manifest an opposition to what they assume to be a railroad monopoly. This is not a railroad monopoly; there are three tracks there, and these people are simply asking the right to pay for that which has already been condemned under the laws of the State of Indiana and which they continue to occupy. They do not wish to subject themselves to any speculation or attempt at speculation upon them.

I do not appear here in defense of any railroad corporation or anything of the kind. When that question comes up it will be time enough for me to speak. In this matter, as the people in the vicinity seem to desire the passage of this bill, and as the interests of the country will be materially enhanced by such a sale, the Committee on Private Land Claims have deemed it proper to report this bill to the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no desire to do any injustice to the corporation that is interested in this body of land; I do not wish to do it.

But I wish to avoid the possibility of any improper sale of this property. I do not desire to deprive this corporation of the benefits of the investments and improvements they have made upon this land. The statement shows very conclusively that they have been somewhat embarrassed by the condition of the property in regard to title, and I think their rights should be protected to the extent of the improvements which they have made, and the tracks they have built on this land. But at the same time it seems to me very proper that there should be some safeguard against any improper combination between the railroad corporation on the one hand and the officers having charge of this sale upon the other. I think it is desirable for them that the exact manner in which they shall perform their duty shall be indicated clearly by this bill.

My friend will perceive that if there is an appraisement—this bill has no reference to the value of the improvements—the land must be appraised just as it is. If this corporation is to take the property, they must take it at the appraised value, and the improvements made by the company may be included in the appraisement.

Mr. PARSONS. The appraisement is to be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why is it not better to specifically refer to the fact, so that there shall be no concealment, that this railroad corporation has located a track on this land and made improvements upon it, and require the Secretary of the Treasury to take those improvements into account in determining what shall be the character of the appraisement; in other words, what shall be the appraised value; and that this property shall be sold upon competition, with the rights of this company so far reserved as they ought to be in justice to the corporations that have made the improvements?

I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. PARSONS,] because he is undoubtedly familiar with the subject, how it happens that the passage of this bill is necessary? The act of last session seemed to cover the whole subject. It provided for this sale and provided that it should be made at public auction. Why has it become necessary to pass this bill?

Mr. PARSONS. In answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] I will suggest to him that the act of last session, though passed by the House and the Senate, was not approved and signed. The particular necessity for this legislation is best exhibited in the act itself and in the report. That report is long, embracing all the material facts which have been ascertained upon full investigation. As there seems to be some question about this matter, I will ask that the report be read, so that gentlemen objecting to the bill and that the House generally may understand the reasons on which the Committee on Private Land Claims have based their conclusion to report this bill favorably.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred bill of the House No. 192, entitled "A bill authorizing the sale of certain lands at Vincennes, Indiana," have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

The land referred to in said bill constitutes a portion of certain lands donated to a class of French inhabitants near Vincennes, Indiana, during the latter part of the last century, and several years before the public lands of that region of country were surveyed and brought into market. The particular tract of land in question, in common with most other tracts similarly donated, had not much value attached to it for many years after it was granted away by the Government, and hence was bartered and transferred on several occasions from one to another in a very informal way, and no record evidence seems to exist as to some transfers of it which it is alleged were made while its value was thus comparatively insignificant.

Near sixty years ago this land seems to have fallen into the possession of an association of gentlemen known as the Vincennes Steam-Mill Company. This company erected a steam-mill and other valuable improvements upon it. After continuing in business for a few years this steam mill company failed and went into liquidation. At the time of its failure it was indebted very considerably to the Vincennes Bank, a banking corporation then in existence and doing business at Vincennes, and to satisfy that indebtedness, either in whole or in part, the steam-mill company conveyed the land in question to said bank. Soon after that conveyance, that is to say, near fifty years ago, the bank also failed, being at the time largely in arrears with the United States Government as a depositor of public moneys. The bank thereupon conveyed this land, with other tracts, to certain trustees for the use of and in part satisfaction of its indebtedness to the Government.

In 1832 this land was contracted to be sold to one Hall Neilson, as the assignee of other parties, for the sum of $6,000, to be paid in annual installments of $1,000 each, and the said Neilson was put into possession of the land under his contract of purchase. Soon after Mr. Neilson had thus acquired an interest in the land, suit was brought against him as the tenant in possession for the recovery of the same by parties claiming title adverse to the Government. This suit was continued from time to time and prosecuted in the courts of Indiana for many years, and finally reached the Supreme Court of the United States. (See Hall Neilson vs. Clark B. Lagow and others, 12 Howard, page 98.) This suit after going back to the State courts was finally decided favorably to the Government. In the mean time other suits were commenced by other parties on claims of title adverse to the interest of the Government in this land. This subsequent litigation has not been fully and completely disposed of, but so far as decisions have been made on the different phases of it which have been ruled upon they have sustained the equitable title of the Government to this property; and the officers of the Government in charge of this litigation are encouraged to believe that a final decision of claims to it will soon be made confirming the title of the Government. At all events they are hopeful that a final solution of all pending claims will soon be reached either the one way or the other.

In consequence of the litigation which thus ensued concerning the title to the land in question the Government was unable satisfactorily to fulfill its contract for the sale of the same to Mr. Neilson, and by reason thereof he became in a few years discouraged, and ultimately abandoned the possession of it. The buildings on this land soon went into decay, and were taken away by some of the adverse claimants. In 1860 Mr. Neilson died, leaving a widow and children, who still survive him. The committee are informed that the said widow and children do not assert any claim to the land, and do not either intend or desire to complete Mr. Neilson's purchase of it.

Within the last twenty-five years three railroad companies, that is to say, the Ohio and Mississippi Railway Company, the Evansville and Crawfordsville Railroad Company, and the Indianapolis and Vincennes Railroad Company, have run their tracks across and placed their switches upon this land.

Some proceedings were had to condemn the right of way over this land, but owing to the disputed condition of the title to it and the number of adverse claimants, it is alleged that the proper parties were not made to such proceedings, and hence any judgment that may have been rendered under them is of doubtful validity, if not absolutely void.

The land lies in a narrow strip fronting on the Wabash River, and runs back in a southeasterly direction for a half mile or more to the high ground in the rear, and is so situated that said railroads had necessarily to run their tracks over it. It is not divided either by any natural divisions or boundaries by which it could properly be sold in parcels in case it should be offered at public sale, as such lands have to be sold under existing laws.

The committee are impressed with the belief that the occupancy of a portion of this land by the railroad companies would probably be a very serious drawback and impediment to the sale of it by the Government as an entirety.

The committee think it also not unreasonable that the railroad companies should, under the circumstances, have the opportunity of purchasing so much of said land as they really need for railroad purposes at its appraised value, without being possibly compelled to purchase the whole tract, in order to protect their interests on what they now occupy.

The committee, too, think it probable that the land will sell for a larger sum in the aggregate if sold in parcels than if sold as an entirety.

The bill, however, under consideration leaves the question as to whether any of this land shall be sold at private sale to said railroad companies to the sound discretion of the proper officers of the Treasury Department. In a matter of so little importance in a pecuniary point of view the committee regard that as a safe and reasonable arrangement. It will be observed that the bill does not in the slightest degree interfere or propose to interfere with any adverse claim to the land referred to in it, but leaves all questions concerning the title to the judicial tribunals to which they properly belong. It is a precautionary measure, merely to be operative only in the event that the title shall be confirmed to the Government. If the final decision shall be adverse to the Government, nothing will be left on which the provisions of the proposed measure can operate. The committee therefore report back said bill and recommend its passage with these amendments:

1. Provided, That this act shall not prejudice any adverse claim or right to the said lands; and

2. Amend by inserting after the word "laws" in the last line the words "in such parcels."

Mr. HOLMAN. I still think it would be better that we should give the right of way through this land to these companies and provide for the sale of the remainder of the land at public auction rather than pass the bill in this form.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Some of us have not yet been able to hear this bill read. I ask that it be read again.

The bill was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. It will be observed that the residue of this land is to be sold as other public lands are sold. It appears to me that the remaining portion at least ought to be appraised and sold at public auction.

Mr. BUCKNER. Why so?

Mr. HOLMAN. Why not?

Mr. BUCKNER. The very object of this bill is to leave this matter discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury. Somebody must necessarily determine this question; and the bill proposes to remit the whole matter to his discretion, except that it is provided there shall first be an appraisement; and certainly the Secretary of the Treasury in the exercise of his judgment will not sell this property at less than what it is considered worth. Why should we subject these railroad companies to the danger of a combination being made against them after they have improved the property and done everything in their power to get the right of way. They need this land for their switches as well as their depot grounds. The rights of the Government are thoroughly protected under this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] will observe that according to the provisions of this bill the residue of this land, after the railroad companies have taken one-third, is to be sold as other lands are sold. Other lands are sold at $1.25 an acre, as my friend well knows. In other words, it is proposed to put the remaining portion of this land on the same footing with the public domain, subject to sale. It strikes me that the residue of this land ought certainly to be sold at public auction. That is the policy we adopt with reference to our reservations for military purposes; when they become useless to the Government, they are put into the market to be sold at public auction upon proper competition.

Mr. BUCKNER. This case stands on a different footing. These parties have already done everything they could to obtain title to the land; they have put their improvements upon it; it is therefore not proper that the land should be put up at public sale.

Mr. HOLMAN. But does that apply to all the land?

Mr. BUCKNER. No, sir; only one-third of it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am trying to get the attention of my friend from Missouri to the fact that I am now saying nothing about the one-third which it is proposed to sell to these railroad corporations. I am speaking about the residue, which according to the provisions of the bill is to be sold as other lands are sold. Now, why should not the residue be appraised and sold at public auction just as you sell your military reservations when they become useless for public purposes?

Mr. BUCKNER. There is no improvement upon the remaining two-thirds.

Mr. HOLMAN. But here is land in a town, a town of very considerable importance; and I am trying to point out to the gentleman from Missouri that this land should be offered at public sale, instead of being subject to entry at $1.25 an acre.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I would like to have the bill read again. Many gentleman, I think, do not understand it.

Mr. PARSONS. I insist upon the demand for the previous question. The bill has already been twice read, and I presume the House understands it fully.

The previous question was seconded (there being ayes 81, noes not counted) and the main question was ordered. Under the operation thereof the amendments reported by the committee were agreed to, and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, there being ayes 87, noes not counted.

The bill, being engrossed, was read a third time.

Mr. BLAND. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. PARSONS] one question: Are we not authorizing and requiring the sale of lands to which the Government has no title, and is not the Government thus obligating itself either to make title or to respond in damages? As I understand this report, the question of title is not yet settled; and by what authority should the Government undertake to sell the lands until that question is settled?

Mr. PARSONS. If the gentleman will remember the proviso to the last part of the bill, he will understand that there is a distinct reservation as to the question of title. And there is no declaration on the part of the House and the Government of the United States of ownership further than the preamble itself recites. The amendment was designed to reserve that question, and does reserve it. I hope the bill will now be put upon its passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no question but the title is correct.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 72, noes 53.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 109, nays 120, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, William H. Baker, Blair, Blount, Boone, John Young Brown, William R. Brown, Buckner, Horatio C. Burchard, John H. Caldwell, William P. So the bill was rejected.

During the vote,

Mr. GARFIELD moved to dispense with the reading of the names.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I enter the motion to reconsider the vote by which that bill was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I hope the rejection of the bill will be reconsidered and that it will be recommitted to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired and the motion to reconsider will be entered.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I move the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HOSKINS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] is entitled to the floor upon this bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, this House of Representatives presents a condition of things that has not existed in this Government for many years heretofore. The anomaly in a republican form of government is presented of a popular branch of the legislative body being constituted so that the majority thereof is in opposition to the general administration and to the other branch of the legislative department. There was some reason for this state of things. It was not the result of accident or chance. But the people of this country in the election in 1874, when this body was chosen, had a deliberate purpose. It was what is called an "off year," when there was little excitement, when the people made up their minds to express a sentiment and principle in the election of their representatives. A most unaccountable and remarkable instance of the popular revolution which took place in that election was in the return of democrats in large republican districts. Many districts, which had been overwhelmingly republican heretofore, were found, to the very great surprise of the candidates after the votes were counted, to have resulted in the election of democratic Representatives. My friend on the left here from Michigan [Mr. DURAND] was so fortunate, or unfortunate, I do not know which, so far as regards himself, but fortunate for the people, as to reverse a popular opposition majority of six thousand in his district, and be chosen by seventeen hundred majority over his opponent. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. THOMPSON,] with whom I have the honor to serve on the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, succeeded the blustering General Butler who used to walk up and down through these Halls and dictate such policy to his party friends as he desired. The quiet, amiable demeanor of the present member is in striking contrast with the pretentious manner of his predecessor. Yes, sir, the people meant something when they brought about these things. And what was their meaning? They had deliberately made up their minds that there must be retrenchment, economy, and reform in this Government. They had trusted long to the party in power, and had been disappointed. They went about it deliberately, and sent a majority to this House which would respect the wishes of the people and carry out the policy which they had determined should control affairs in this Government. Now, what the people do deliberately they generally do well.

Fortunately for this side of the House, they made the majority so great that we can lose a few votes on these bills and still be able to respond to the popular demand. I am not surprised when one of these bills comes up for the purpose of bringing about retrenchment in the Government that certain gentlemen on this side of the House are not able to go with us. There is some one who in all these measures sees objections and cannot go with us; but when we have gotten through with all of them, we will have a few votes to spare on these measures of economy and still meet the reasonable expectations of our constituents. When we have done our work and submitted it to the co-ordinate branches of the Government, and then afterward to the people who sent us here, we feel assured that they will indorse our course. I was somewhat surprised, however, in the discussion of this question at the remarks of my esteemed friend from New York [Mr. HEWITT] who represents the great commercial metropolis of this country, and also of my amiable and venerable friend who sits near me [Mr. WOOD, of New York] They seem to have mistaken, to have entirely mistaken the object of this bill. One would have thought from their able arguments on this question that this was "a bill for an act to prohibit commerce between this country and all the nations of the earth." The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] said, "We cannot dispense with the carrying trade of this nation." Well, I want to know who proposes to dispense with the carrying trade of this nation. My amiable friend [Mr. HEWITT, of New York] with whom I have the honor to serve on the Committee on Foreign Affairs said that "this bill strikes a deadly blow at our expanding commerce, at our growing industries, at our commercial ports, and at the welfare of our country." I read, sir, the gentleman's words from the RECORD of this morning.

There must be something terrible about this bill if it is intended to cut off all communication between this country and foreign ports. I had never conceived this to be the object of it heretofore. Gentlemen seem to think that a few diplomatic officers and consuls, resident in remote and obscure places, are the agencies by which commerce is created or permitted between governments. There never was a greater mistake. They are the results of commerce, and not the cause of it. They are the effects of commercial intercourse, and not the moving motive or cause.

Why, Mr. Chairman, if a gold mine should be discovered at some obscure place in South America and it should be proved to have the richness of the discoveries made in the State of California in 1848–'49 vast enterprises would be set on foot, steamships would be freighted and would leave our ports, and in a few months a great city would be built up there and the products of Illinois and of the whole of this country would be landed on those shores. There would be a state of fifty thousand inhabitants there before the red tape of the State Department could get a consular agent located in that place. I am very thankful that commerce does not depend upon the establishment of consuls and consular agents at various places. Commerce will bring these when they are needed.

Mr. Chairman, when the committees of this House began the consideration of the diplomatic and the consular bills, with a view to reducing the expenses and securing such economy as would not impair the usefulness of the service, certain partisan papers of the country assured us that we were wasting our time and energies; that new members of Congress were in the habit of making a fight upon those subjects which they knew least about, the consulates and the Army; that this was not the field for applying a rigid economy. We were directed to the Treasury Department, to the War Department, to the Interior Department, to the Post-Office Department, and told that these were the proper places to look for extravagance and to seek to cut off abuses. We were told that our diplomatic and consular representatives were almost starving in foreign countries, or subjected to such pecuniary embarrassments in order to eke out an existence as to greatly impair the efficiency of the service.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] yesterday instituted a comparison between the palatial residence of Lord Lyons in Paris and the humble quarters of Mr. Washburne, the American minister. Sir, I thank him for that comparison. It is a comparison which we might well draw between an effete aristocracy and a growing democracy. Our country is not respected abroad the less by reason of the fact that our ministers go about there in the ordinary apparel of gentlemen and live in apartments befitting the representatives of a popular government.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] in his remarks to the committee on this bill said:

> I believe every gentleman of intelligence on this floor will admit that the foreign service of the United States, the State Department, both as it is exhibited at home in its civil functions and abroad in its diplomatic and consular functions, has been for years the most economically conducted, the most honestly managed, the most carefully kept up of perhaps any of our Departments. All men of all parties have given their testimony in years past to that as the general truth.

Well, sir, I shall not dispute the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, but we will see how that is before we get through; and I have no doubt the other Departments are just as honest as this is. But notwithstanding these assertions this side of the House and the Committee on Appropriations have steadily pursued, in reference to our diplomatic and consular representatives, the course to be carried out in all other departments of the public service, namely, a careful scrutiny into expenditures, abuses, and all manner of extravagance. We are not making exceptions. We are following a principle. We have laid the ax at the root of the tree, and everything that is not sound shall be hewn down.

The necessity for a rigid economy was never greater in the history of this country than it is now. All our industries are prostrated. Thousands of laboring-men are out of employment and many of them go tramping up and down through the land begging for bread. And yet we are told that a foreign embassador cannot support himself respectably on $17,500 a year. Sir, we must come down to hard-pan. We must teach the office-holders of this country that the people are economizing themselves and that their servants must do likewise. The Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, of which I am chairman, have been taking the testimony of witnesses and have obtained a vast amount of valuable information bearing on this bill. I ask of every member of this House his attention to this subject, and if I do not convince this committee that the foreign service is in no respect an exception to the extravagance, inefficiency, and peculation prevailing in some other Departments of the Government, then I will admit that I am mistaken; that there are no abuses in the Government; that the whisky ring, and the Credit Mobilier corporation, and other iniquities were not wrong in themselves, but merely the necessary means used by a kind Providence to teach public officials how dangerous it is to be wicked.

The bill under consideration reduces the appropriations for all the diplomatic and consular service from $1,352,485, the amount estimated to be necessary by the State Department, to $916,647.50, being a saving of $435,837.50. This may well be denominated a sweeping reduction, as it is over 32 per cent. less than the appropriation for the current year for the same service. I am not prepared to say that this bill is perfect and that all the reductions should be made in the manner indicated in its provisions. And while there are some items that may perhaps be increased, yet I am equally certain that there are others that are still too high, or that some offices still retained in the bill ought to be abolished. I will point these out before the bill is reported to the House, or some of them at least.

The reductions in the salaries of diplomatic officers are such as are demanded by the nature of their service and by the absolute necessity at this time for a rigid economy in every department of Government. Does anybody suppose that any one of our present foreign ministers will resign on account of the reduction of their salaries as proposed? Will Schenck do it, or Bancroft Davis, or Boker, or Godlove Orth, or Cramer, or Horace Maynard resign and come home in disgust? I trust not. It would be a great calamity to them, if not to the country. The annual salaries of ministers to the four great powers were $17,500 each in gold. This bill reduces them to $14,000. Will any of our constituents complain of this? They will rather suggest that, in view of the general stagnation of business and the necessity for individual economy on the part of rich and poor, it is not unreasonable to ask our foreign diplomats to give fewer entertainments and live in less splendor than formerly. We do not ask them to deny themselves the necessaries of life. We pay our cabinet ministers $8,000 per annum, and I assert without fear of successful contradiction that every member of the President's cabinet is called upon to make more pecuniary outlays, in order to live in a manner befitting his position, than is required of any one of our ministers at foreign courts. President Grant has no difficulty in finding gentlemen to fill his cabinet offices on account of inadequate salaries.

The salaries of our ministers are not the only expenses we have to meet in connection with our diplomatic service. In reading the accounts of our ministers abroad for contingent expenses it will be seen that the expenses of each mission are no small items. The contingent expenses of some of the leading missions for the year ending June 30, 1875, were as follows:

E. B. Washburne, France	$3,650 62
J. C. B. Davis, Germany	3,648 34
R. C. Schenck, Great Britain	3,359 29
Jewell and Boker, Russia	1,327 88
Caleb Cushing, Spain	8,447 78
Boker and Maynard, Turkey	12,609 99
Jay and Orth, Austria	2,460 78
J. R. Jones, Belgium	997 44
J. R. Partridge, Brazil	291 97

The above will serve as an illustration. The small accounts rendered by Mr. Jones and Mr. Partridge are sufficient to prove the extravagance of the others. Mr. Schenck's contingent account for the year ending June 30, 1873, amounted to $16,700.65. This included items for telegrams for quarter ending March 31, 1873, amounting to $9,191.38, gold.

I find here an item of $487 to Adam Badeau; perhaps some of you have heard of him. The receipt is as follows:

> CONSULATE-GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, > London, December 4, 1871.
> Received of Major-General Schenck, United States minister, $487, paid me on account of contingent expenses of foreign intercourse.
> ADAM BADEAU,
> Bearer of Special Dispatches to Madrid.

Mr. Badeau was at this time consul-general of the United States at London, receiving a salary of $6,000, having been commissioned April 28, 1870, and continues in office at this time.

This was for special services rendered by Badeau as bearer of dispatches from Mr. Schenck to Madrid; they must have been valuable services, I presume, because the Government had to pay $487 for them. The real cost of his trip was probably $75, if it was ever necessary for him to go there at all on behalf of the Government.

Mr. Cushing's account contained an item of $5,752.56 for telegrams for the quarter ending March 31, 1875.

It is fortunate for the tax-payers of this country that "Christmas comes but once a year," as our diplomats are liberal at Christmas with other people's money. They charge up to the United States items for such gratuities as follows, and I almost blush to name them:

E. B. Washburne, 592½ francs	$119 00
J. C. B. Davis	38 10
Caleb Cushing, (extraordinary expenses)	56 58
Eugene Schuyler, (chargé d'affaires at Russia, New Year)	69 54
Eugene Schuyler, (Easter presents, 1875)	57 88
Marshall Jewell, ("on taking leave")	19 42
B. F. Stevens, (always liberal)	81 25
George H. Boker, (on occasion of Barim)	75 00

These are small matters, I admit, and perhaps it is not dignified to refer to them. But they aggregate $546.77—which if a permanent annual tax upon the people, imposed by the necessities of the situation, is equivalent to an increase of the national debt to the amount of $5,000—on account of Christmas and other gratuities by foreign ministers.

Here, sir, you behold him who was called the watch-dog of the Treasury when in this Hall, but as soon as he gets abroad he begins to waste the people's money in every conceivable manner.

Then here is B. F. Stevens (and I class him among the diplomats, because he is an expensive luxury) giving of the people's money with a liberality which would do credit to any gentleman, if it was his own money that he was giving away.

I call the attention of the committee to George H. Boker's account for contingent expenses. The large amount of such expenses in the Turkish mission needs explanation. Upon examination of the accounts and vouchers on file in the Fifth Auditor's Office, it appeared that Mr. Boker concluded a treaty with Turkey just before his departure for Russia in April, 1875. He presented a bill for "presents purchased for officials of the Turkish government on conclusion of treaties, as per instructions of Secretary of State." This account amounted to $10,607.56 in gold, and was promptly paid. The items of this bill are quite suggestive, and I may be pardoned for particularizing. The vouchers on file are in the French language—never to be understood by granger congressmen—and the rich presents were purchased in Paris, of course. They are as follows; the happy recipients will hereafter be the envy of every tax-payer in America:

Statement of presents given to Turkish officials on the conclusion of treaties.

CH. FRAY.

This is a most remarkable list of presents. We have diamonds, rubies, and emeralds in rich profusion. Imagine the festive youth, the son of the minister of foreign affairs, promenading upon the avenues of Constantinople or dancing with princesses in the palace of the Sublime Porte, wearing upon his shirt-bosom an eight-hundred-dollar breast-pin ("fer à cheval, pierres variées," as the voucher informs us) paid for by the tax-payers of America.

Mr. Chairman, the time was, many years ago, when the people were so sensitive about these expenditures that, because a few gold spoons had been purchased for the Executive Mansion, the people of this country became indignant and overthrew the administration. Here we have one minister in a foreign court expending over $10,000 in gold for presents to Turkish officials on one occasion. It has been thought that such favors were reciprocal. I do not know whether that be so or not; but it seems to me the Turkish officials have never said "turkey" to us once.

Mr. HOLMAN. You do not know about that.

Mr. SPRINGER. At least Mr. Boker has not asked Congress to allow him to receive presents from the Turkish government, as he ought to have done had any been made him. What this treaty was I do not know; it has not been transmitted to us with the President's message. The people will be anxious to know whether it, like the Indian's gun, "has cost more than it has come to."

The bill under consideration makes no provision for the Greek mission. This will be unfortunate to no one except to John Meredith Read, our minister-resident at that court. The dispatches sent by him to this Government, and submitted in the reports made to Congress, are of such a character as to demonstrate conclusively the perfectly useless character of that mission. My friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has been kind enough to refer to one of them to show its great importance. But here is another which he has overlooked, which shows not only the nature of the correspondence, but the great learning and erudition of our minister. It is on page 666 of Document No. 1 on Foreign Relations. He says in this communication, dated Athens, August 7, 1875:

Mr. Sotiropoulos—

These names are very euphonious—

former minister of finance, in his able brochure entitled "Εχθεσις περι μεταβολης," &c.

Now I shall have to get my learned friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] to translate all this Greek, for Mr. Read is actually sending the dispatch partly in English and partly in Greek, and we common people in the West never can know what it is, unless we can get it translated by some one. What is this all about? Greece is a great country; it is a sweet morsel in the mouth of our minister, this Greece to which he is accredited. They have wonderful people there. And he reports the subjects of taxation by that government. Enumerated among those subjects are bees, pigs, potatoes, onions, garlic, mulberries, and fig-trees. This is indeed a very great country, to have such fruitful subjects of taxation.

But that is not all. Mr. Read tells us what manner of country it is. He describes it as being one of those semi-barbarous countries in which it is very unsafe for any gentleman to be outside of the corporate limits of the city. I am assured of that fact. It is very unsafe, perhaps the most unsafe of any country claiming to be civilized in the world! And "a minister to Greece" is a great misnomer, for he is a minister to Athens only. He dare not go a mile outside of the corporate limits of the city without military protection. But there are other good things in his correspondence. I have one here under date of March 8, 1875, from Mr. Read to Mr. Fish, and it is as follows:

SIR: A magnificent ball took place at the palace on the 3d instant. On that occasion the American minister—had the honor to be selected to lead a contra-dance with the queen.

That means, of course, J. Meredith Read—

Now, that must have been delightful. Just imagine the minister resident of the United States leading the contra-dance with the Queen of Greece. He was so elated over it that he had to dispatch the news as soon as possible to this country, it was so very important. He goes on further:

The spacious salons were filled at half past nine, and the festivities continued until half past five in the morning.

At that time, we presume, our minister departed for his residence. I can imagine the scene, as he wended his way through the ancient city, at that unseemly hour of night, inspired, as he wrote in the letter read by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] on yesterday, by the view of—

The majestic outlines of the Acropolis and its immortal ruins, illuminated by the calm, silvery rays of the same fair moon which looked down upon the labors, ceremonies, and sacrifices of Phidias and Pericles two thousand years ago—

singing that American refrain, which must have sounded to the inhabitants there as Greek would to us:

We wont go home till morning,
Till daylight doth appear.

Yes; as my colleague suggests, wearing a spiked-tailed coat, and a white cravat, of course. He then goes on:

The arrangements throughout were of the most admirable character. An elaborate supper for eight hundred guests was laid in the royal salle à manger and in the two large adjoining rooms, while the ministers of state and the diplomatic corps—

John Meredith Read, of course, for that is what that means—were entertained by the king and queen in the beautiful private apartments of their majesties.

No common people could enter these private apartments of their majesties, none but diplomatic representatives and ministers of state. If the people of this country could have looked upon that group, which might be fitly described in the touching language of John Hay, narrating the finding of Little Breeches in the sheep-fold, they would have—

Seen them huddled there
So warm, and so sleepy, and white.

How did our minister get there? It is simply amazing. It must have been by some providential interference, as was the case with Little Breeches, whose advent into the sheep-fold was caused by the interposition of angels—

They jest scooped down and toted him
To whar it was safe and warm.

Mr. Read goes on further and says:

The palace is well adapted for social assemblages upon a grand scale.

Well, I am very glad to hear that; I was afraid they would be crowded, there were so many present.

The crimson carpets bring into brilliant relief the white marble floors.

I do not understand how the floor could be seen when the carpet covered it; but perhaps he could "see as through a glass darkly."

On either hand a double row of attendants display the splendors of the national costumes. The two principal ball-rooms are of vast size.

Now that is very important, because it is very annoying when ladies wear long trains to be crowded into small dancing-rooms. I am glad the apartments were spacious. It is very important, too, for us to know this, because we are paying money for it.

Their highly decorated walls and lofty ceilings stand revealed in the soft rays of two thousand wax-candles.

I thought they had gas in that city; but it seems not. It took 2,000 wax candles to illuminate on that great occasion. And then our minister proceeds to say that it was very refreshing to see "not only descendants of heroes, but heroes themselves walking along through those halls;" no doubt he imagined that he was one of those heroes!

But he goes on in this state paper to give us some information to which I call the attention of the learned members of this House, because I confess it is a little mysterious to me. I never knew before the important information here transmitted; and I am willing to pay a small amount for it.

The names of Mavrocordato, Kolokotronis, Botzaris, Capo d'Istria, and many more which long ago became household words in America, have now in Greece living illustrations in the second and third generations.

Now, whoever heard before that Mavrocordato or Kolokotronis were household words in this country? What little "contraband" walking up and down through the cotton-fields of the sunny South bears the euphonious name of Mavrocordato or Kolokotronis? If any representative has such a constituent let him speak now; "for him have I offended." [Laughter.] "I pause for a reply." [Laughter.] "Then none have I offended." There is no such person in this country, and Mavrocordato and Kolokotronis, as household words, exist only in the fertile imagination of our resident minister to Greece.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what must have been the delightful sensations of the State Department when they received this dispatch from Mr. Read, stating that he was dancing a coutra-dance with the queen. We can hardly imagine the sensations that must have crept over the amiable gentleman that presides in the palace on the other side of the Executive Mansion. I know some one must have sent a dispatch in reply, saying:

"On with the dance! let joy be unconfined;
No sleep till morn, when youth and pleasure meet
To chase the glowing hours with flying feet."

Enviously yours, &c.

Of course they all wanted to dance a set with the queen on that occasion; but they could not. John Meredith Read was so fortunate as to have this great pleasure all to himself——

Mr. HEREFORD. What is the cost of printing all this?

Mr. SPRINGER. It costs $7,500 a year for the salary of this honorable gentleman. How much it costs to print all state papers, so called, I cannot tell; and the contingent expenses will doubtless increase the grand total to a considerable sum. In fact, I have looked over figures so much of late that I am quite confused and cannot keep them in mind very well. But I can imagine the sensation that will come over J. Meredith Read when he hears that this bill has passed both Houses, been approved by the President, and that "Othello's occupation's gone." He will doubtless cast one wistful look at the palace of the queen, and exclaim in the language of Byron:

Maid of Athens, ere we part,
Give, oh, give me back my heart!

[Laughter.]

And after J. Meredith Read has embarked upon a stately ship in the harbor at Piræus, and sees the queen standing on the shore, he will doubtless continue the beautiful song:

Maid of Athens! I am gone:
Think of me, sweet! when alone.
Though I fly to Istambol—

I suppose that in Greek means Philadelphia. [Laughter.]

Athens holds my heart and soul:
Can I cease to love thee? No!
Ζωη μου, σας αγαπω.

More Greek! It is getting worse and worse all the time. I will have to call upon my classic friend from New York [Mr. COX] to translate this Greek. I am a little rusty. Perhaps my learned friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] can enlighten the House.

Mr. SEELYE. I would suggest, Omne ignotum pro magnifico. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Thank you! We all know just what that is. [Renewed laughter.]

The bill might have gone further than abolishing the Greek mission. It might have taken in Denmark. If the mission to this little kingdom had been stricken out, nobody would have been alarmed about it; for I assure you, gentlemen, "something is rotten in the state of Denmark." That kingdom is but a relic of the past; it is only great in poetry and romance. Without it we should have had no Hamlet, and the Prince of Wales would have been a bachelor! That kingdom does not command sufficient importance in the eyes of the world to justify us in sending a minister to it. What political significance can that government have to us? A mission to Hayti or San Domingo would have been more important. When a European government exists only at the will or sufferance of other powers it can have no political importance so far as this Government is concerned.

The Hawaiian Islands are of growing importance to our Government, but a consul-general is quite sufficient for all the business between the Government of the United States and that of King Kalakaua for the next twenty-five years.

It is of the greatest importance to Kalakaua to cultivate friendly relations with this Government, but we can get along without him.

The correspondence between Minister Pierce and Mr. Fish, from August 20, 1874, to April 29, 1875, may be briefly stated. In the first place, we are told that "King Kalakaua was about to leave Honolulu for the United States." He was "about to leave," mind you, and note the importance of that fact! In the second place, we are informed that the time was fixed for the king's departure. In the third place, we have the departure of the king. Fourthly, we are told of the king's return to Honolulu. Then, in the fifth place, he made an address to the people; and, in the sixth state paper, we learn that resolutions were passed thanking the people of the United States of America for their kindness to him. I see from appropriation bills passed at the last session of Congress that it cost us $19,000 to entertain King Kalakaua while he was in this country; and the salary of our minister was $7,500 more.

But, Mr. Chairman, the Hawaiians were grateful, and among the dispatches transmitted to this House is the following, copied from the Hawaiian Gazette. The report of the proceedings of this meeting closed as follows:

At the close of the proceedings their majesties retired, and the audience dispersed.

Here we have a piece of information of the greatest importance:

It was not generally known that the king would speak in English, or there would have been a much larger representation of the foreign element. It was one of the finest and most orderly assemblages that we have ever seen in that church on a similar occasion. The king and prince were dressed in plain citizen's clothes, with royal badges; while the queen, who was tastefully attired in black silk with white lace shawl, looked very attractive.

[Laughter.]

I have no doubt of that fact. [Laughter.]

The whole proceedings went off very creditably to those who took part in them. His Majesty has ordered that the resolutions be printed on white satin, and they will be in this shape forwarded to the President of the United States.

[Laughter.]

Now, gentlemen, this is diplomacy. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL. Is the gentleman reading from the state papers?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir; it is all in this document of correspondence between our minister to the Hawaiian Islands and other diplomats and Mr. Fish, Secretary of State. These resolutions I have no doubt have been printed on satin and now adorn the archives of this Government as an enduring monument to the white satin diplomacy now prevailing, and which cost the people of this country such large sums of money every year.

Something has been said about these South American missions, and their importance. It will be found on examination, so far as this matter is concerned, that the interests of the United States are not likely to suffer by the abolition or consolidation of some of our missions in South America. I have before me a copy of the Chicago Tribune, a very ably edited and widely circulated newspaper, and if the House will allow me I will ask the Clerk to read an extract from its editorial columns.

The Clerk read as follows:

At Hayti the respectable colored gentleman who represents the United States seems to be mainly occupied in turning his residence into an asylum for rebellious cut-throats, and in issuing in exchange for fees naturalization certificates of dubious legality. Better make him a consul, and save money and reputation. The consolidation of the Central and South American missions is another proper thing to do. Most of them are mere receptacles for played-out Congressmen and decayed dead-beats, who besiege an incoming administration, and literally bore themselves into these sinecures. Our late minister to Peru had so little to do that he went into business in Lima as a pawnbroker.

[Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. That extract is taken from the leading organ of the republican party in the Northwest. It is a paper noted for its candor and truthfulness, and I commend what it states on this subject to my friends on the other side of the House who have taken such alarm at the discontinuance of a few of these unnecessary foreign missions. I am sure that the paper represents the sentiments of a large portion of the people of Illinois of both parties.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] was particularly alarmed at the great wrong which is to be inflicted upon our commerce in doing away with these diplomats in South American states, which are republics only in name. Gentlemen have said that this bill was going to destroy our commerce and our trade; that we must have diplomats there in order to encourage commerce. There never was a greater mistake than this.

I have a different idea as to what means are necessary for increasing our commerce with the South American states. It is not by sending consuls and ministers there at great expense, but by the passage of the bill introduced in this House by my distinguished colleague [Mr. MORRISON] who is chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, or some similar measure of revenue reform. That bill will have the effect of making it possible for articles manufactured in this country to seek an outlet in the markets of the world. I ask the Clerk to read another extract from the Chicago Tribune referring to the bill introduced by my colleague, [Mr. MORRISON.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Its enactment will powerfully tend to revive manufacturing industry by cheapening the cost of production, and thereby enabling our manufacturers to export their surplus goods to foreign countries. We can have no real or reliable improvement in the times until this be done; nor is it possible to resume and maintain specie payments until we largely increase our exportation of manufactures.

Mr. SPRINGER. This is another very valuable suggestion from a very good paper, and I commend it to gentlemen who want to encourage trade with South America. There is one proposition that cannot be gainsaid. We can never sell the manufactured articles of this country in South America or in any other country until we can furnish them to the people of that country cheaper than other countries can. We may have our diplomatic officers there as thick as mile-posts, but they will never bring a dollar of trade; but the people of South America, the very moment they can buy the products of this country at the one hundredth part of a cent less than they pay for the corresponding products of other countries, will purchase from us, and not before. Trade is governed by prices and the law of supply and demand. What political economist has ever said that commerce is controlled by consuls?

But, Mr. Chairman, I come to another subject embraced in this bill. That is the contingent appropriation of $50,000 for foreign intercourse, which my friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] facetiously suggested we had divided by two. I propose to show the committee that we might divide it by another two and still be reasonable. A great portion of this cost of foreign intercourse grows out of what is called the dispatch-agency business. This dispatch agency is what might be denominated the fifth wheel to the postal wagon. It is a business which has no foundation in law, but only rests upon precedent. It has grown up in this country in this way: The Secretary of State—some gentlemen may not have thought of this—does not intrust his communications to foreign ministers and consuls abroad to the ordinary mail communication, but has a dispatch agent in New York, another in Boston, another in London, another in Havre, and another in Hamburg, to whom he sends his mail-matter, under arrangements entirely separate from those of the Post-Office Department. The entire cost of the dispatch agency for the year ending June 30, 1875, was as follows:

London agency:
B. F. Stevens, agent, salary, in gold	$2,000 00
Expenses, in gold	25,336 69
New York agency:
Radcliffe Baldwin, agent, salary	1,000 00
Expenses	5,444 13
Hamburg agency:
Edward Robinson, agent, salary, in gold	750 00
Expenses, in gold	35 08
Havre agency:
Thomas Taylor, agent, salary, in gold	800 00
Expenses, in gold	33 32
Boston agency:
Jonathan Amory, salary	400 00
No expenses.
Total	35,799 22

The total cost of foreign agencies, in gold, for the time mentioned was	$28,955 09
In American currency, found by adding 15 per cent	33,298 33
Cost of New York agency	6,444 13
Cost of Boston agency	400 00
Total cost of all agencies, in United States currency	40,142 46

This is the entire cost in American currency of the dispatch-agency business; a sum that is annually paid for transmitting 10,784 pounds of printed matter and 362 pounds of written matter.

I have here an almanac which gives the rates of postage at London, where Mr. Stevens, the agent, is stationed, and from which he claims to have forwarded mail matter and prepaid the postage. He charged the Government this last year the enormous sum of $11,674.57 in American currency for postage on that matter. Now you may take the postal rates and apply them to this mail matter, and you will find that you could send every pound of it to Constantinople for less than $1,300.

Gentlemen may say this is honest. There may be an explanation of it. But here is the amount of mail-matter as communicated to the committee by the Secretary of State himself, and if you pay the regular postal rates you will find that you can send it all to the remotest place mentioned for one-tenth of the money Stevens claims to have expended for postage.

We have an agency also in New York, that of Mr. Radcliffe Baldwin. I must refer briefly to this. It seems that Mr. Baldwin draws his salary of $1,000 a year, and has nothing to do. This appears from the fact that he employs one Tice to do all the business. Tice is a historical name in this country. You have all heard of Mr. Tice's meter; and here is another invention by which the people's money is appropriated without consideration. There never was a better itemizer than this man Tice. Nearly the entire volume of this manuscript which I hold in my hand consists of charges written up by Tice against the Government for nominal services. Whenever a steamer comes to New York he boards her and charges $1. If he is so successful as to capture a mail-bag he charges two or five dollars for his perilous services. Thus his items amount to fifteen, twenty, or twenty-five dollars a day. For what? For going on board steamers and gathering one or two mail-bags; and he never neglects to put in cartage at $1.50 for each service. It seems, too, that he subscribes for all the leading newspapers of the day to keep him posted, and he hires a box in the post-office which he puts down to "Uncle Sam" at $16 a year. The New York Journal of Commerce he puts down at $17 a year. All this costs him nothing, for he is a dispatch agent of the United States, and men in these positions are always liberal with the people's money.

But for a veteran itemizer commend me to B. F. Stevens. He can heap up charges against the Government with less compunctions of conscience than any man I know of. His items would so startle my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] if he had a chance to peruse them, that I fear to have them printed because of the effect they might produce upon him. Mr. Stevens's items aggregate over $25,000 in gold. For what? For distributing 10,784 pounds of printed and 362 pounds of written mail matter in the city of London and prepaying the postage thereon to its destination. His postage account for each month of the year ending June 30, 1875, rendered in pounds sterling, was as follows:

1874—July	161	11	10
August	172	13	10
September	181	13	2
October	191	7	7
November	167	12	0
December	183	10	8
1875—January	170	11	4
February	166	3	10
March	182	8	4
April	185	9	8
May	162	13	4
June	171	14	0
Federal currency	$11,674	57

This may be honest, but when his accounts have been investigated it will be found that this whole system of dispatch agencies is an outrage upon the tax-payers of the country and that there is no necessity for its continuance, and why? Because we have now postal treaties with most of the governments of the world, by which treaties it costs us comparatively nothing to send all our mail matter to other governments of the world. By reference to the report of the Postmaster-General, transmitted to this House, it will be found that postal treaties have been concluded between this country and the most of the countries of the world. The report says:

> Each country retains all the postage it collects on the postal union correspondence of every kind, both on the prepaid sent or the unpaid received, thus dispensing with all accounts between the several post departments of the union upon the international correspondence exchanged between them.

Our correspondence with diplomats and consuls may be prepaid with our own official stamps and the cost to the people of this country will be the mere price of printing the stamps and carrying the mail to the borders of the other country.

What is the remedy then for this dispatch-agency system? It is simple: abolish the whole dispatch-agency business and let the mails of the State Department go through the regular channels.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MONROE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to finish his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair repeats what he has already said, that there is no power in Committee of the Whole to change the rules of the House.

Mr. MONROE. But if there be no objection it may be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the question to the committee. Is there objection to the gentleman from Illinois being allowed to complete his remarks? The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him if he is not aware of the occasion for these special dispatch agencies?

Mr. SPRINGER. I know of no occasion.

Mr. KASSON. It is that during many years governments have had seals of other governments and have opened and examined correspondence and dispatches, resealing the dispatches with the counterfeit seal.

Mr. SPRINGER. I cannot yield; I have no time; I am speaking by the indulgence of the House.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman has just had all the time he needs yielded to him by the courtesy of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois indicate how much time he requires?

Mr. SPRINGER. I shall proceed as rapidly as possible. I have this to say, that the mail facilities for transmitting the business correspondence between the people of this Government and all the nations of the earth are the regular mail communications, and if these communications are not sufficient to transmit such dispatches as we have heard read to-day, I am at a loss to know what are the comparative advantages of the mail service.

But I must not overlook the consular service as affected by this bill. I ask the indulgence of the committee for a moment upon that point.

The salaries of forty-five consulates are abolished and the salaries of others are reduced. Three of the consulates whose salaries are abolished paid the consuls $3,500 each, or $10,500. The fees collected at these places for the year ending December 31, 1874, were only $1,159.29. The salaries paid exceeded the fees received by $9,340.71. One of the consulates abolished—Hakodadi, in Japan—paid its consul a salary of $2,500 per annum. The fees collected at this place for the year ending December 31, 1874, amounted to $303.06; loss to the Government, $2,496. Seven other consulates were in class V, and paid each a salary of $2,000; total, $14,000. The whole amount of fees collected at these consulates for the year ending December 31, 1874, was $1,757.79; loss to the Government, $12,242.21. Eighteen other consulates belonged to class VI, and paid a salary of $1,500 each to the consuls; total cost to the Government, $12,000. These consulates, for the year ending June 30, 1875, paid fees to the amount of $4,605.03. The excess of salaries paid over fees received was $7,394.97. Sixteen of these consulates where salaries are abolished were in class VII, and paid salaries of $1,000 each, or $16,000 in all.

The whole amount of fees collected at these consulates for the year ending June 30, 1875, was, $3,245.60. The excess of salaries paid over fees received was $12,754.40.

In all the consulates where salaries are abolished the fees collected were only $11,070.79, while the salaries paid were $58,000, showing an excess of $46,929.21 of amount of salaries paid over fees received.

The consuls whose salaries are abolished are mostly in remote parts of the world, where little or no trade exists with the United States and where none is likely to be built up.

But this bill only abolishes the salaries of the consuls at those places. By section 1695 of the Revised Statutes, page 303, the President is authorized to provide for the appointment of vice-consuls and consular agents in such manner and under such regulations as he may prescribe; but no allowance shall be made for the pay thereof, except out of the fees collected. But postage and stationery may be allowed. The bill, then, does not necessarily deprive any place where there is now a consul of the benefits of such an officer. It only abolishes the salary, and a consular agent may be appointed who may be a resident merchant or banker and who will gladly take the office for the honor, commercial advantage, and the fees. This is not unusual. But this is not all. The consul may be continued without a salary. I assert then, notwithstanding all the alarm that has been manifested, that not one consulate has been abolished by this bill. The consular business will proceed just as it has proceeded heretofore, only it will not cost the people quite so much. That is all. But gentlemen express alarm at abolishing the salaries of forty-five unimportant consulates, as if this were a new thing. There are now eighty-nine consuls of the United States in different parts of the world who receive no salaries, among them the consul at Reims, in France, where the fees amount to $1,666.50; the consul at Brunswick, in Germany, whose fees amount to $2,498.25; the consul at Victoria, whose fees amount to $3,365.35, and many other places of equal importance. There are eighty-nine consuls who get no salary at this time, and only one hundred and eighty-eight consuls, consuls-general, and vice-consuls who receive salaries. Yet there are three hundred and fifty-seven consular agencies whose agents get no salaries, except the fees collected up to $1,000. The fees collected above that sum are paid over to the consul who retains $1,000 from all his agencies and pays the balance into the Treasury.

Our consular officers are, then, as follows:

Salaried consuls, &c	188
Non-salaried consuls and consular agents	446

This is as it stands under the law now in force. If this bill passes, the result will be as follows:

Salaried consuls	145
Non-salaried consuls and consular agents	489

I have been able to exhume from the archives of the Government—in fact it was not in the archives at all, but I have obtained it—a copy of the report of a gentleman who was appointed by the President of the United States to inspect our consulates. I mean Mr. De B. Randolph Keim, of Pennsylvania. He was the most successful traveler I ever knew. He began in May, 1871, and in eighteen months he had traveled 63,000 miles and visited nearly every important consulate. He says on page 21 of his report, which has but recently seen the light of day:

> I might extend my observations upon the irregularities, irresponsibility, and unaccountability of the present consular system of the United States to an indefinite length. There is hardly a feature in it that does not indicate imbecility in point of executive force, humiliation in point of character, and mingled extravagance and penuriousness in point of practice.

He goes on then to refer to the personnel of these officers, and says:

> The officers, as a rule, at the time of my visit, had been obliged to open their books anew, or had had it done by a subordinate. Almost every consulate had some defects in its history, owing to the incompetency, low habits, and vulgarity of some of its officers during the endless round of evils incident to official rotation. Abuses had been committed in the collection of fees, in the exercise of judicial powers, in the adjustment of the business affairs of American citizens, in the settlement, where permitted, of the estates of intestate American citizens dying abroad, in selling the American flag, in "running out" ships, in the discharge of seamen, in affording relief or medical attendance to destitute or sick American seamen, in issuing illegal passports, in countenancing shipping-masters, in taxing Chinese emigrants. Indeed the most interesting feature of my investigations was the ingenuity displayed by consular officers, since the act of 1856 particularly, in defrauding the Government and grasping gains from various outside sources.

In another place he says:

> To cap the climax of all, I am not aware of a single case of formal investigation and punishment of a consular officer for his offenses. Even removal from office, where made, has been, as a rule, exceedingly tardy. I am therefore not surprised at the temerity of officers in the unfaithful performance of their trusts.

I might read many other extracts from this report to the same effect. Such is the testimony of one of these agents who visited every important consulate of the United States. In reference to the swindling practices that are carried on in the distribution of this seamen's relief fund, he shows that ream upon ream of fraudulent vouchers have been sent to the State Department; that natives have been procured for small pay to make these fraudulent claims, in order to draw this relief fund and afterward divide it between the consul and those employed by him.

And yet the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] says this is the most economical and honest Department of the Government. What must the other Departments be, if this is the character of the one under consideration?

But I am glad to be able to say that there were some honorable exceptions to the general demoralization, dishonesty, and incompetency which prevailed among our consuls. The honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] was, when Mr. Keim visited South America, the American consul at Rio de Janeiro. Mr. Keim said of him in his report that the administration of the gentleman [Mr. MONROE] then consul presented "a gratifying example of official ability." All his accounts were found to be correct, and the manner in which the consul discharged his duties in reference to the seamen's relief funds "spoke volumes for the efficiency and character of the officer in charge." I take pleasure in thus giving my colleague on the Foreign Affairs Committee the benefit of this honorable exception.

Mr. Keim makes mention of the illegal and unofficial fees collected by our consuls in the British Isles; and with this I will close so far as the consular service is concerned. He shows that in the British Isles, under the pretext of commissioners' fees for administering oaths, in one year there was collected over $50,000. In London, commissioners' fees were charged in one year to the amount of over $11,100; in Liverpool, $6,000; in Manchester, $9,000, and so on. And since that time the consular service has so largely increased—I ask special attention to this fact—that in the consulate of London one hundred and twenty-two invoices were signed in one day, upon which, according to the information contained in this report, a fee of sixty-three cents in gold is charged on each by the commissioner, not an officer of the United States. That amounts to a large sum of money, and makes the consulate worth from $40,000 to $50,000 a year in unofficial fees, if the same average should be kept up.

I have a statement, furnished to me by a gentleman who was in London for many months, who stated that one of the consuls at Liverpool, who went there a poor man during Mr. Lincoln's administration, came away with a fortune of $300,000. Yet gentlemen tell us these officers are starving in foreign ports; that we are niggardly to our consuls. The reports of Mr. Keim, in the Department, lying there undisturbed for three years, charge these officers with all manner of speculation and swindling; but we have not heard of a single instance of a man being brought to punishment for it.

We are told that this is the best Department of the Government; that it is high-toned, and we must not touch it. We will soon have occasion to see what is in the other Departments of the Government. This Department has had its agents going around the world, among them, as a gentleman near me suggests, the Rev. Dr. Newman. He went immediately after Mr. Keim came back, but we have heard nothing of our consulates from Dr. Newman through official published reports. We have had these gentlemen making their trips around the world. It is true Mr. Keim, whose mission at first appeared to be a job, took the matter in dead earnest, and made a report of what he saw.

Mr. RANDALL. And he has been snubbed by the State Department for it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I suppose so, for I wrote a letter to the State Department and asked for all the reports received from the persons appointed by that Department, and Mr. Fish assured me, in a communication that I have here, that that Department knew nothing of it; that no such persons had been appointed by that Department. And yet Mr. Keim, in his report, furnishes a copy of his commission. If any gentleman wants to see it, I have it here before me, signed by President Grant, and his letters of introduction to consuls were signed by J. C. Bancroft Davis as Acting Secretary of State and his instructions by Secretary Boutwell. Mr. Fish, however, regarded Mr. Keim as an agent of the Treasury Department.

Mr. RANDALL. He told too much truth.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, it would seem so. And although the law required that this last report which I hold in my hand should be sent to the House of Representatives and be printed as a public document, I am assured that to-day it has never been printed with the public documents as required by law. I obtained a copy from a gentleman in this city to whom it had been given by Mr. Keim. No attention has been paid to it.

I might entertain the House with a long list of instances of corruption and malfeasance. Gentlemen would be amazed at the length of the recital. In no case has one man been brought to justice on being exposed. Mr. R. F. Farrell, now of New York, having broken up the wine ring at Cadiz by his zeal and unswerving integrity, was removed by the President and a man put in his place, who assured Mr. Farrell that he would not trouble the wine merchants. Mr. Farrell was a faithful officer, and received the highest commendation for the energetic administration of his office while consul at Cadiz from Secretary Seward. But the wine ring did not like him. He would not sign fraudulent invoices, and they demanded his official head. Mr. Farrell testified before the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department at this session that in his opinion the Government had during the past ten years been defrauded out of at least $40,000,000 by the fraudulent undervaluations of invoices.

And who was Mr. Farrell's predecessor? A man of whom the Department had positive proof that he had sold the American flag for a bribe of $1,000, and had cleared a ship engaged in the slave trade. He was simply invited to come home; and I understand he dropped down in Michigan, ran for the Legislature, and was elected.

Mr. RANDALL. To what party did he belong?

Mr. SPRINGER. He did not belong to ours, I am sure, or he never would have been appointed to a consulate. Otherwise I have no information as to his politics.

I will not weary the House further. I have gone over the subject very hastily. I thank the House for the attention it has paid me. I believe that after gentlemen have examined carefully the consular service they will agree with me that it needs reform as well as all the other departments of the Government, and if those on this side of the House intend to keep faith with the people who have sent them here they will not let up on this bill by reason of the alarm that has been expressed by the honorable gentlemen from New York, [Messrs. WOOD and HEWITT,] who have supposed that our commerce with foreign countries was in some way unfavorably affected by it.

We must meet this measure and every measure alike. This bill is not an exception in its efforts toward economy. It illustrates a rule that we are going to apply to all the appropriation bills. We are going to cut down the expenses in all the different branches of the Government; and the President will find that we have divided his salary by two, as well as the appropriation for contingent expenses of foreign intercourse. But it is to be regretted that the President's salary cannot be reached during the present term. Other officials who have been receiving large salaries and doing little or no work will find that their services will soon be dispensed with. And this House will not have finished its work until it shall have cut off all manner of official extravagance, abolished all sinecures, exposed corruption and peculation, reduced the public expenses $30,000,000, and thus have carried out the pledges made to the people when we were elected, to establish in all the branches and departments of the Government retrenchment, economy, and reform.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I think the House and the country should be congratulated upon the unanimity with which this bill comes from the Committee on Appropriations. If I understood correctly the honorable gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] who reported it, there was no dissent in the committee as to its provisions. If I am wrong in that statement, I can be corrected.

This is a bill for retrenchment. It is one of many; for many of similar import are to come. It proposes a reduction of some $436,000 upon the appropriations of last year for foreign purposes.

It was said by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] the other day that our average expenses for diplomatic and consular service for many years had been about $1,300,000. In 1859 these expenses had grown to $912,000; and the average since that time has been about $1,200,000. To be more exact, let me quote the exact figures:

Our diplomatic and consular expenses for the year ending June 30, 1859, were only $912,120; for the year ending ending June 30, 1860, they were $1,047,745; for the year ending June 30, 1861, they were $1,158,380; for the year ending June 30, 1862, they were $1,260,544.34; for the year ending June 30, 1863, they were $1,235,889.89; for the year ending June 30, 1864, they were $1,260,544.34; for the year ending June 30, 1865, they were $1,354,100; for the year ending June 30, 1870, they were $1,110,734; for the year ending June 30, 1871, they were $1,041,347.

Last year they were about $1,400,000. I do not count the extraordinary sum, $1,929,817, that was embraced in the bill to pay the British mixed commission awards. This year we propose a reduction of at least $436,000. It should be and it is done intelligently. I deprecate the remark made yesterday by my honorable colleague [Mr. WOOD] that this reduction is without wise consideration. Sir, it has had careful examination. Why, Mr. Chairman, in my experience in this House for over sixteen years, I have never known an appropriation bill to be presented with more prudence and heed. We are acting upon authentic information given in advance. This is apparent from the speech as well as the report presented by the honorable gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON.] He gave us a report to accompany his bill, upon which he spoke wisely and well. He even gave us a map of South America to illustrate the proximity of those Spanish American states affected by the provisions of the bill. In addition to that, we have had the studious examination of the Appropriation Committee to show most amply the relations, commercial and otherwise, we bear abroad, and especially to the South American states.

THE PROPOSED REFORM.

The reform proposed is succinctly stated in the report of this committee. I quote from the report to show the scope of this retrenchment:

In these [South American] republics, as will be seen, the bill recommends a very considerable change in diplomatic representation. Following the example established by the act of July 11, 1870, combining the representation at Paraguay and Uruguay, and the act of May 22, 1872, placing all the Central American states in the charge of one minister, the committee have concluded that no important interest would suffer by the dropping of two of the ministers now in Government service, and combining the diplomatic representation at Colombia, Peru, and Ecuador in one person, to reside wherever, in either of those states, the President may direct. The representation in the states of Chili and Bolivia is also combined, thus dispensing with another salary of $10,000. Paraguay and Uruguay have been attached to the Argentine Republic, saving another salary. The minister to Greece has been dropped as unnecessary, and in lieu a fourth-class consulate established at Athens. The minister to Hayti has also been thought unnecessary, and a fourth-class consulate established at Cape Haytien in lieu thereof. The bill discontinues two envoys extraordinary and four ministers resident, forty-four consuls and officers of lesser grade, reduces the salaries of the ministers at Great Britain, France, Germany, and Russia $3,500 each; those at Spain, Mexico, Austria, Brazil, Japan, and China $2,000 each; that of the minister at Italy $4,000, and those at all other places, with the exception of the minister representing the United States at the Central American states, $1,000 each. Many consuls have been thrown into a lower grade, and other reductions have been made. The total of this change has resulted in a reduction of the bill $435,837.50 below the appropriation of last year, and within a trifle of the same amount below the estimates from the Department upon which the bill is based.

It is no answer to this bill, and its provisions for retrenchment, to say that it destroys our commerce or shackles our navigation. That is not a fair nor a logical argument. In no single particular, as will be shown before we get through with this discussion, has there been any abridgment in the consular or diplomatic service which does not run hand in hand with commerce and navigation and which does not subserve the best general interest.

I know the bill strikes in certain places. This report shows exactly how much our ministers are to be curtailed, how much their salaries are to be reduced, and how many consulates are to be abolished. You will find it all in this record, and I need not refer to it in detail. It also shows where we strike the "contingencies," and the "loss by exchange," and the item as to seamen to which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] adverted, and as to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] gave such a conclusive reply, based on proper data.

HOME ECONOMIES.

This retrenchment is entitled just now to the consideration of this House. At the present time we are not quite well enough off at home to maintain our foreign relations abroad in such a superb manner as we used to do; nor can we, nor ought we to, ape the manner of other nations in the splendors and excesses of our diplomatic display. We can well understand why, owing to our greater commerce, in 1859 or 1860, or even before those years, we might have paid more for this service. But when you, sir, send your boy out from your home, while you yourself are not very "well to do" in your domestic circumstances, can you afford to have him live quite so well as if you had a good exchequer? Although gentlemen may say that we are not paying our ministers enough according to the old standard, are we not paying them enough according to the standard of domestic, if not of foreign, economy?

It is not alone because we would save millions by this policy of retrenchment. But we have a duty to do in showing where millions by the hundreds, might have been saved in the past ten years of prodigal rule. More than that. It is a part of the process of summoning before the high and popular court of impeachment those who have squandered our resources, and who did it at a time when the war-fevered and war-worn patient was endeavoring to convalesce. In order to prescribe remedies for restoration and to make a diagnosis of the ills wherewithal we were afflicted, we must omit no scrutiny. We must stop at no persuasive call, however honeyed, to desist.

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who made a masterly address to us, pregnant with figures and sense, has told us that he knows how hard is the task of cutting down appropriations. He speaks from experience. He knows the "local pressure" of interested parties who desire to "swell appropriations." He also confesses that every Executive Department here "tends to enlarge the field of expenditure within its jurisdiction." He commends the resistence to such pressure which is proper to be made and which our committee is making. Why, then, does not he throw his sword into the scale in favor of this gallant band of committeemen? He itemizes certain points where reform is or will be proper. There is the fortification bill, public works and buildings, rivers and harbors, and many civil establishments in Washington "overgrown by the work thrown on them by the war." He would reduce these; ay, ten or fifteen millions below the appropriations of last year. Ah! indeed; who was the chairman of appropriations last year? What party did he lead when we plead against abuses? "Work thrown on them by a war" ten years ago ended; and is he just beginning to find out, under a new rule here, that ten or fifteen millions per year might have been saved? A hundred and fifty millions not saved! Were they squandered since the war? If, then, it appears as the sequel, when the House shall have concluded its money bills and the Senate shall have received or rejected our reforms, that forty millions a year might have been saved during ten years, what sad words of tongue and pen will be his "might have been." Four hundred millions squandered in ten years! What is there to show for it? A hapless people living beyond their income and devouring their capital; want; lack of labor; depression of business and perpetual dread of panic; and worse!

Was there ever a time when economy was so needed, so demanded by popular depression and misery? The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] told us that his own section was so overtaxed and overburdened with debt that it was almost impossible for them to obtain the necessaries of life. This is too true all through the South. How is it in the West? My friend from Ohio [Mr. VANCE] handed me a paper with an account of the "bread brigades" forming in Lawrence County, Ohio, in which there is a sad picture, only equaled in its terrible reality by what is daily and hourly too frequent in the great metropolis I represent. If in Mississippi the once beautiful plantations are "now neglected and growing up in sedge-grass," what must be our condition when the cry for "bread" makes the peninsular part of Ohio an object of sympathy and beneficence!

THE SHERIFF'S FLAG.

If in the South the "sheriff's flag" floats above the hammer of the auctioneer of estates and men and women are losing their properties under such compulsory processes, what must we think of prosperous Pennsylvania? A Philadelphia paper insists that the condition of the laboring class in that city and in all parts of the country is deplorable; that from fifty thousand to seventy thousand persons formerly employed at manufacturing in Philadelphia are now out of work.

A distinguished member from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has published the statement that thousands of his constituents, including men, women, and children, theretofore employed in manufacturing, had been practically idle since 1873, and that so dreadful and protracted had been their poverty that they were grateful for the crusts given to beggars, and that thousands of able-bodied workmen had been forced to become tramps, seeking for food they had no opportunity to earn. These statements, detailing the wretched condition of the unemployed workmen of Pennsylvania, are confirmed by Senator WALLACE. I notice also that sixty thousand miners of coal are thrown out of employment in Pennsylvania.

Is New England better off? Why, even there they are laboring on half time and at the lowest scale of wages.

THE FANCY ECONOMISTS.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] was reminded by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] not to boast when he put on his armor, like him who taketh it off. The gentleman [Mr. GARFIELD] is a little interested, his amour propre is at stake, I fear, in keeping up the taxes. Was he not the author of many former bills? He and his party, which for ten years would not touch the currency to resume and voted down propositions to economize, now all at once become urgent in their dire dilemma that we should resume and retrench whatever betides, but they are equally opposed to us when we report bills in the precise "shape" in which they come. Take any shape but this—of retrenchment! "Our honor is at stake," sighs the member from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL,] and he too is in "entire sympathy" with reform; yet if we reform, alas! commerce will be ruined, or never arise from its ruins. Thus mourn other Jeremiahs; and so every bill for retrenchment is opposed on some pretext or another.

The unanimity of sentiment on the part of the opposition, who have spoken under the lead of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] in favor of economy, is only surpassed by their concerted failure to sustain it. Their mere words are "apples of gold in pictures of silver." They are not nutritious, however beautiful. Hear a few of their sentiments! The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] says that "the object of this bill is retrenchment. I am most sincerely in sympathy with that object. I expect often to vote that way. But, sir, this bill presents an unpromising field!" He went further and gave us his definition of economy. He would cut off any branch which was not worth the money. Words—words—words; sounding brass and tinkling cymbals. Then his colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] takes up the brass, and I mean no disrespect in using the expression. [Laughter.] He draws the bees to his political assembly by saying: "O, there should be no politics in such bills! Do I not sympathize with the committee in their laudable efforts to cut down expenditures?" And then he lauds to a pitch of irony the splendid economy for years of the State Department! It is the old story of the traveler out West. He meets a native on the Reserve—a skeleton, worse than the fancy photographs of the prisoners recently alluded to: "You seem, my friend, to have the fever and ague in these parts." "O! no, sir," replied the man, shaking from crest to foot and yellow as ocher—"No, there's-none-around-here, but plenty of it—in the next county!" It is the old milk-sickness story. It is just a little further on! [Laughter.] These friends of economy cannot, like the man who ate his soup with a fork, get enough of it in the abstract, but they are not so hungry for the concrete reality! According to the proverb, by too large a grasp or embrace of the larger ideal, they take such a furious hold of the total thing that they fail to hold anything in detail.

ECONOMY—JUST NOT NOW.

It will be curious to watch how their platoons will fire into our retrenchment bills. We have already had their attack on the West Point bill; but they had not the courage to call the ayes and noes on that. And the people, ay, and the very officers, now applaud the measure. When it comes to this bill, a new set of assailants, and, I regret to say, fortified by the business tact and influence of my colleagues, [Messrs. HEWITT and WOOD,] appear upon the scene. But I venture to say that there will be no flinching upon the part of this majority on this measure when the debate is concluded and the scandalous abuses of the consular and diplomatic service are fully displayed. Soon we will have the fortification bill, and the opposition guns will thunder upon that. Then the river and harbor bill. That will appall the boldest. Then the war appropriations. Thundering Mars will roar till Janus will open his temple door. Neptune will sound his conch-shell from the very deeps, till the resounding shores echo its protest against the Navy bill. When the Indian bill appears reduced to an honest diminution, the war-whoop will sound from Missouri to where rolls the Oregon, which used to hear no sound save its own plashing.

The burden of these loud complaints against these bills is that salaries are reduced. While the general shrinking of wages and values is going on everywhere, the clamor here is that large salaries secure good services. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] struck this note: "You only want rich men for office; you would shut out those who can live without private fortune; you would establish a plutocracy." Then my colleague [Mr. HEWITT] subjoins his practical remark: "In my extensive business I would pay men better for similar service;" and then my other colleague resubjoins his exclamation: "If this bill saved twenty millions I would not vote for it."

It might be well, in answer to one of those gentlemen, [Mr. HEWITT, of New York,] to say that, as a plutocrat of the loftier and gentlest type of benevolence, he might well afford to pay for his work what the poverty-stricken and panic-bedeviled people of this country ought not to pay. What he can afford in his business this people cannot for their administration. The cost of living abroad is not the measure of foreign salary, but what is left at home to pay. Suppose, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] argued, that in ten years the cost of living abroad has doubled, yet has it not more than doubled at home? Who pay these salaries? The plutocrats; the rich who travel far countries for to see, and whose protection in travel and trade is the main object of diplomatic agency? No; the poor and needy. The rich men of this House, abroad, or in commerce, do not know and feel the burden. No one but the wearer can tell where the shoe pinches. Gentlemen cannot tell this who clothe their thoughts and their feet in slippered, luxurious ease, and feel no twinge except the luxury which comes of gout and prosperity.

EARLY UNSALARIED HONOR.

"We cannot have good service abroad except on large salary;" is that your argument? Need I point you to our earlier statesmen, from Washington, Jefferson, Adams, and others, down to our own selfish earl. But my colleague, [Mr. WOOD,] whose lineage by our Directory is that of a Philadelphia Quaker, has said that Franklin honored this country, as minister to the court of France, dressed in plain attire, and on large salary. Is it possible that he did not know the history of that mission of Franklin? He went out to France in October, 1776. When he left Philadelphia, this is recorded of him by his biographer, (Sparks, volume 1, page 416:)

As a proof of Franklin's zeal in the cause of his country and of his confidence in the result, it may be stated that before he left Philadelphia he raised all the money he could command, being between three and four thousand pounds, and placed it as a loan at the disposal of Congress.

But it is further recorded of him that he served substantially without compensation; ay, more than that, that he denounced the ambition and avarice of public men as baneful to the state. I read from Sparks, volume 1, page 517:

It had long been an opinion of Dr. Franklin that in a democratical government there ought to be no offices of profit. The first constitution of Pennsylvania contained an article expressive of this sentiment which was drafted by him. One of his speeches in the national convention was on the same subject. "There are two passions," said he, "which have a powerful influence in the affairs of men. These are ambition and avarice; the love of power and the love of money. Separately each of these has great force in prompting men to action, but when united in view of the same object they have in many minds the most violent effects. Place before the eyes of such men a post of honor, that shall at the same time be a place of profit, and they will move heaven and earth to obtain it. The vast number of such places it is that renders the British government so tempestuous. The struggles for them are the true source of all those factions which are perpetually dividing the nation, distracting its councils, hurrying it sometimes into fruitless and mischievous wars, and often compelling a submission to dishonorable terms of peace. And of what kind are the men that will strive for this profitable pre-eminence through all the bustle of cabal, the heat of contention, the infinite mutual abuse of parties, tearing to pieces the best of characters? It will not be the wise and moderate, the lovers of peace and good order, the men fittest for the trust. It will be the bold and the violent, the men of strong passions and indefatigable activity in their selfish pursuits. These will thrust themselves into your government and be your rulers." * * * He thought the pleasure of doing good by serving their country and the respect inspired by such conduct were sufficient motives for true patriots to give up a portion of their time to the public without a pecuniary compensation beyond the means of support while engaged in the service. In his own case he had an opportunity of putting these principles in practice. All the money he received as president of Pennsylvania for three years he appropriated to some object of public utility; and if the whole fifty years of his public life are taken together, it is believed that his receipts in the form of compensation or salaries were not enough to defray his necessary expenses.

What if his presence were to instruct these two members, [Mr. RANDALL and Mr. WOOD,] both natives of his Quaker City. To which would he give a smile; to which a frown? At first flush he might say to one, "Sir, your presence in any assembly, your dignity, your ability, the admiration you deservedly excite is sufficient compensation for one so rich in lands and bonds." To the other he would say, "Go on! Read Poor Richard! Be just, be thrifty, be trustworthy; and a grateful people will add to the honor of your birth near the Hall of Independence with a crown of approbation; for is not a good name better than riches?" And to all of us he would say: "You are living in evil times, when men in public station make money and salaries the touch-stone of honorable service for their country. In my days it was considered 'decorous and sweet even to die for one's country.' In your day, it is considered decorous and sweet to live for one's country, and to live well, and gather from the brow of labor its sweat of pearl to decorate the fantastic gaudiness of greed and luxury.

UTOPIAN IDEAS.

Mr. Speaker, it is said by Sir Thomas More that when the foreign embassadors came into Utopia the people of that perfect realm laughed at the bedizenment and jewels which glorified their persons. Benjamin Franklin, whose thought drew lightning from the cloud, and whose diplomacy broke the scepter of tyrants, must have read this satire, when in his snuff-colored dress and with his unsalaried state, he was made the welcome guest of the greatest of the Old World, while he kept his trust and faith to the people of the New World.

BRITISH POLICY.

What is the argument to justify large salaries for diplomatic and consular service? Why, Great Britain pays highly and does a large business over the sea and over the world. To be sure, Great Britain has an inexorable grip on these volcanic Spanish American republics, or upon most of them. I read to-day in a report made by a distinguished gentleman from Illinois, [General HURLBUT,] who was our minister to Bogota, that the English government had a mortgage on the customs-dues of the republic of Colombia amounting to 85 per cent. He wrote home that unless there was some repudiation of that mortgage upon the customs-dues there would be a revolution in that country. Our Isthmus route is daily imperiled by English supremacy. There are I know large fields for enterprise in Spanish America and in the Pacific. I do not deny the statements made by the gentleman; and I would prefer if anywhere when retrenching, not to cut down in China and Japan any consulate already existing. But as to mortgaged Spanish America, what is the argument in favor of keeping up our diplomatic expenses to a high figure in those republics? The gentleman [Mr. MONROE] gave us a table. In that table he showed the area of those countries; he showed also their imports, exports, receipts, expenditures. He also showed the population and the public debt. What for? To induce us to add salaries to our consuls? That is beautiful argumentation. The area of a country is to determine our diplomatic and consular arrangements! If that is the case, why do we not have a minister to Iceland? Why not a consul seated amid those great volcanic wastes where no man lives and where the lichen would starve? Why do you not have diplomatic accommodations with the interior of Africa or in the Desert of Sahara? If mere area is to be made the test, you will find plenty of room on our planet.

As to population, to be sure there is one-third of our own population in these Spanish American republics. It numbers sixteen and a half millions, but most of it are Indians. They are not a producing class; they are not the class of which we buy or exchange. They give us alpaca wool, guano, niter, ores, dyes, and other stuffs; they give us medicines and hides; but we have just as many consuls there to-day as we need for our commerce. That is the essential point.

CONSULS AND COMMERCE.

But, Mr. Chairman, gentlemen mistake when they say this is a bill to revive commerce. Bills of this kind cannot revive commerce. Consuls are incidents only to commerce. I will tell you soon where and how our commerce can be revived; why your diplomatic and consular system, instead of reviving commerce, amounts to nothing in this regard. It does not draw commerce along with it; it is hardly the jolly-boat in the wake of the steamer. It is only a bubble in the wake of the steamer of commerce.

What you want in order to make commerce and revive shipping in this country, is a fair revenue law. Your taxes should be removed from the ingredients which enter into our wooden and iron ships. Thus you make it the interest of our people not to invest in bonds which pay no taxes; but to invest in the vehicles of oceanic and distant ventures, which will pay more than the income on untaxed bonds. The competition of wooden and sailing vessels with steam and iron vessels I do not propose to discuss. The Baltimore clipper is a memory. India and China and their trade is greatly occupied by other nations. The old "Indiaman" is a myth. Comforts go with steam and dividends follow comfort. The simple truth must sooner or later appear, to wit: that the incidental protection to other interests has murdered our carrying trade. The internal-revenue tax of two and one-half cents a pound on cotton helped to cripple us as a sailing people. But the crowning crime which has put gyves on our commerce is the tax imposed on all the ingredients which enter into the construction of ship and steamer. This, sir, is a bounty to the foreign producer and builder. It kills our competition. Worse than the depreciation of currency, it deters capital and destroys enterprise. If you will not by your bad tariffs let us buy ships abroad, then let us by good tariffs buy the materials to make ships at home. Then you will revive commerce, and navigation, and shipping. I see my friend from Pennsylvania on the alert. He always is, when I mention ship-building. I know we have some enterprising ship-building in Pennsylvania. As we approximate in this country to the price of iron abroad, even without the aid of Government subsidy, but with a fair, honest revival of business and lower tariffs, we may again have our old revival of ship-building. Then navigation and commerce will begin a new century.

But never until our tariff is modified, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, will we have our olden ship-building. We have lost it already. I have the statistics here to show this in detail. Our tonnage to-day is only about eight millions of tons. Great Britain, that used to be our only rival, has sprung up to twenty millions of tons. I did not intend to read the statistics which clearly show what I have stated, but if the House will indulge me I will briefly give the details on that point referred to by one of my colleagues yesterday, in a comparison of business between the United States and Great Britain. In Great Britain the exports and imports amounted last year to over five hundred and fifty millions pounds sterling. Of this I am credibly informed. I know in previous years it was a little over this statement. In 1872 it was £608,000,000; but for the present year it is $2,750,000,000. The imports were not much in excess of the exports. In the United States there was but eleven hundred millions of this kind of prosperity, making a difference between the two countries of sixteen hundred and fifty millions.

In Palgrave's Notes on Banking, page 50, the imports and exports of England in 1819 are placed at only £69,000,000 sterling. In 1844, £144,000,000; but in 1872 what had they risen to? To £608,000,000. If they have fallen off any since, according to the former computation, it is because of excessive production and the consequent plethora.

I have already shown you what is our tonnage as compared with Great Britain. I should be more exact as to American and foreign tonnage. Our commerce is in question, and our foreign affairs are in the quandary.

The following table shows the amount of American and of foreign tonnage entered at ports of the United States for the years named:

Years.	American tonnage.	Foreign tonnage.	Excess of American tonnage.	Excess of foreign tonnage.
1830	967,227	131,900	835,327	.....
1840	1,576,946	712,363	864,583	.....
1850	2,573,016	1,775,623	797,393	.....
1860	5,921,285	2,353,911	3,567,374	.....
1861	5,023,917	2,217,554	2,806,363	.....
1864	3,066,434	3,471,219	.....	404,785
1866	3,372,060	4,410,424	.....	1,038,364
1868	3,550,550	4,495,465	.....	944,915
1869	3,402,668	5,347,694	.....	1,945,026
1870	3,486,038	5,669,621	.....	2,183,583
1871	3,742,740	6,266,444	.....	2,523,704
1872	3,711,846	7,094,577	.....	3,382,731
1873	3,612,631	8,033,087	.....	4,470,456

We thus see that from 1861 to the beginning of 1874, a period of only thirteen years, there is a change against the American shipping of 7,277,819 tons. Now our carrying trade costs us millions. It is reckoned at eighty or a hundred millons, which goes to England, France and Germany for the Atlantic freights and fares alone.

But there are more facts of value for study and reflection. In 1860 the total American tonnage which entered British ports was 1,747,651 tons, the total British tonnage entering our ports being 1,136,364 tons. But in 1870 the American tonnage entering the British ports was only 479,670 tons, while vessels flying the British colors entering our ports during that year measured 2,778,823 tons. Herein we have greatly retrograded; England has greatly increased.

COMMERCIAL SUPREMACY OF ENGLAND.

Now, how did Great Britain get this advantageous power? When did it come to her? It came from her policy, her wisdom. Not before the repeal of the corn laws, not before her reciprocity with France, not before free trade was fixed there; for before that time, during six years, England took off almost as many taxes as she imposed.

But I must be more accurate: The taxes imposed by Parliament during that time (1836–1841) were £2,161,227. The taxes repealed in the same time were £2,131,303. During this time the postage was reduced to a penny. That much was off, and we know the result. Did revenue increase? Were expenses lessened and receipts increased? The revenues diminished nearly a half million sterling. Did the national debt decrease? No. Discontent came; Chartists arose. Then free trade came and corn-laws were repealed. It was the triumph of Peel, Cobden, Bright, and Ebenezer Elliott. But 1852 saw the consummation, and England then began to see through her mists and fogs her way to fiscal freedom. During the six subsequent years, or rather, to take a better era, from 1860 to 1866, the taxes imposed were £3,263,-215, and those repealed were—astounding fact!—£19,209,863. Eighty millions of our gold dollars of a difference; eighty millions of taxes reduced under liberal policies over the imposition of taxes. Then England leaped forward under some magic fiscal Magna Charta. The world wondered, and Cobden and Chevelier and the unselfish and rational giants of economic thought everywhere received apotheosis.

I say here that the British taxes, imposed six years after their free trade, were £2,263,000 sterling. The taxes that were repealed were £19,210,000 sterling. In other words, we have a difference of £16,000,000 sterling, or more than $80,000,000 of taxes repealed or reduced over taxes imposed or augmented; and the result was gratifying to all the world, and especially to the British exchequer. It was by free trade, by a liberal policy, by allowing all the world to trade with her, and Great Britain to trade with all the world, that she made this magnificent change and this great prosperity. And until we do as England allowed her citizens to do—buy our ships where we please, or allow our people to build ships without restriction and without prohibition of the articles which enter into the ships—we never can reach the degree of prosperity in the shipping interest which we had in 1859 and 1860. Moreover, Mr. Chairman, allow me to say that some of our best ship-builders agree as to that. I have a letter, which was published, from Donald Mackay, the great ship-builder of Boston, who said that if he had fair play in the taxing of commodities which enter into ship-building, than he could again have his ship-yard ring with its olden industry.

TARIFFS AND COMMERCE.

But the main reason I have for dwelling on this subject now is that I may answer the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL.] He said—(and he argued very astutely for a man who is about to seek a new election) that our tariff bill did not tend to retrench in one sense, but it levied more taxes in another; and he called us to an account on this side of the House for that. He mentioned the tea and coffee tax, and the silk tax, and some other taxes. He asked me to respond to him. I will give his own reasoning on that subject, and then I will respond to him.

When I go to my constituency and say to them, "Gentlemen, we have reduced the expenses of the Government," they will say to me, "That is all very well; but have you reduced this indirect taxation?" Of course I will answer, "O, yes; we did reduce it." They will ask me how, and I will tell them the simple story how we did it—the democratic House, I mean, for it will not have my vote. I will tell them that we have cut down the tariff on silks and silk dress-goods from 60 per cent. ad valorem to 40 per cent. ad valorem. They will sit in mute silence—

These interesting and intelligent constituents will sit in mute silence when the gentleman makes that statement. No wonder they will sit in mute silence at the audacity of such a statement—but will ponder in their minds how that tallies with the theory that the luxuries of life shall pay the higher duties.

SILK AND SMUGGLING.

Will they if they are intelligent? Well, now, let us look at the silk business for one moment. That involves the revival of commerce; for I say you cannot have that except you do take off your taxes in a revenue way. Why, sir, there is a man now in New York in Ludlow-street jail whose name is Lawrence. He has been put there for smuggling—smuggling silks, which are easily smuggled, being very valuable and small in bulk. He has stated—and it has come out in authentic form with respect to some of our best merchants who bought from him,—he has stated that he made contracts, or always could make contracts, to bring silks and silk goods into New York for 18 per cent. on the cost price. Well, what does he do with them or what is done with them by the men who bring them in? Why they sell them—a thing not very creditable—they sell them to merchants who are reputable, and then they sell them, and they pay 12 per cent. So there is 30 per cent. gained on the goods by the smuggling. When the duty is 60 per cent. on silks there is a premium on rascality of 30 per cent., as the gentleman from Minnesota will see. Now, if we reduce the tariff on silk goods to 40 per cent. it takes away the incentive and inducement to smuggling, and we on our side of the House can say to the gentleman's mute constituents, all of whom or some of them at least have silk dresses in their homes; we can say then to the gentleman's constituents when they sit mute, when they are pondering about these luxurious silk dresses, that we took away the incentive to smuggling by fixing the tariff so that honest merchants can trade in New York as importers and as wholesale dealers and retailers. And then we will say, or rather we will insinuate in a quiet way, that after their own Representative got all the facts of the case, he voted against that tariff on silk to help rascality in New York.

Mr. DUNNELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. COX. Very well, sir.

Mr. DUNNELL. How much revision of the tariff will it require to do away with all the rascality in New York? [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. Well, about as long as the tariff-customs duties are collected by the gentleman's own party. I refer him to his own collector and President Grant & Co. [Laughter.] I will not go any farther West. [Laughter.]

BREAKFAST.

Now I want to say to my honored friend from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL,] for I love to debate with a man so courteous and pleasant and who is merely seeking information for his constituents, I want to read to him what we are proposing in the tariff bill; and first I will say that if we do raise the duty on tea and coffee a little by our tariff, we will take care to cut off enough of the tariff in other respects where your bounties come in and where your gratuities are to make up the added duty on tea and coffee. Sir, the gentleman raises the old cry of the cheap breakfast-table. Now, we have disposed of that several times. Perhaps the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] knows that the present tariff taxes the spoon, the salt, the dishes, the table-cloth, and the table itself. We may reduce the tariff on many articles, and if we do put a duty on tea and coffee, we shall then give you an honest, good breakfast-table on a purely revenue basis, without bounty, and invite you to come to take breakfast with us.

NO SINS OF OMISSION.

But the gentleman thinks that we are not in earnest about this tariff bill. You will see about that before the session is over. Before we go further I will say that I shall be guilty of no sins of omission. I will tell him where we propose to cut down: Cotton dresses from 61 to 30 per cent.; spool thread from 81 to 40 per cent.; cotton yarn from 60 to 40 per cent.; bar-iron from 40 to 26 per cent.; wire from 54 to 32½ per cent.; hoop-iron from 55 to 36 per cent.; saws from 40 to 27 per cent.; sewing-machine needles from 47 to 22 per cent.; steel from 40 and 50 per cent. to 30 and 32 per cent.; screws from 60 to 37 per cent.; the poor man's iron pot from 45 to 32 per cent.; lead from 45 to 22½ per cent.; cast-iron piping from 50 to 35 per cent.; wool from 50 and 51 per cent. to 25 per cent.; woolen flannels and blankets from 90 to 47 per cent.; woolen cloth from 67 to 47 per cent.; common alpacas from 70 to 50 per cent.; clothing from 53 to 45 per cent.; carpets from 70 to 45 per cent.; bunting (the dear centennial flag) from 112 to 48 per cent.

I know that it is unpopular with some people to save indirectly. I know that a man in Minnesota might sleep in cold winter weather with half a blanket with the prospect of getting three, but I think he would rather have two now rather than the prospect of a dozen in the future, or rather than have a tariff which gives bounties and subsidies to the prosperous, and does not give revenue. I have a list which I can show the gentleman which shows that where $100,000 were collected as duties upon certain articles which went into the Treasury, a million of dollars go outside as bounties; but I need not argue against bounties.

I would ask my friend from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] whether he has not voted for subsidies and bounties and all that sort of thing? I know that is his record, and therefore I can make no point on him for inconsistency when he votes for bounties under the tariff. He is not my man for that fight. Does he not vote for all such devices? Does he not vote for railroad and other subsidies? Why, sir, you are obnoxious all around on the question of subsidies and bounties. But we propose to make revenue and not give bounties. We would cut down marble from 129 to 40 per cent.; gun and blasting powder from 60 and 58 per cent. to 40 and 24 per cent. And with this explosive article I close the list for the present, as by this time the gentleman's theory must be blown up higher than Thomas's infernal machine has blown his victims in Bremen.

It may be asked what reference this tariff talk has to the business before the House. How does it concern the diplomatic bill? Gentlemen have argued that we are destroying commerce. They pretend to be anxious to revive it. They would do it by giving certain salaries to consuls. If you mean to revive commerce take off the bounties we now pay to selfish and greedy people, and give fair interchange of commodities. Let the people North, South, East, and West buy in the cheapest markets of the world, as we do among our States. Give them a fair show all around the world, and then we can take your southern and western cereal and cotton products, send them to European markets, and bring back something to help in time of need.

FREE SHIPS AND THEIR FRIENDS.

I do not know whether the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] was in Congress in 1872 or not; I think he was not. I have looked up his record upon that point and I cannot catch him. I think he was not here in 1871.

Mr. DUNNELL. After March 4, 1871.

Mr. COX. In March, 1871, a bill was brought in here for the purpose of giving free registry to iron vessels of two thousand tons burden and over that might be bought abroad. It was just at the beginning of the Franco-German war, as you may remember. President Grant sent a message to Congress asking us to permit these vessels to be bought and placed under our flag. It obtained the assent of this House. There was a large number of republicans for it. I do not think the name of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] is recorded on either side or as being absent; I do not know how he voted. But we did carry that measure in the House and it dropped out somewhere between the House and the Senate in the last days of the session. What was the result? When that war broke out there were twenty-seven great German steamers, built upon the Clyde, lying at Hoboken. Their owners were willing, as the French navy was then powerful on the sea, to have them placed, temporarily at least, under our flag. What for? So that they could bear our cereal products of the West to Europe.

Mr. KELLEY. Did not that debate occur on the last day and in the last hours of the session?

Mr. COX. It was in the morning of the 4th of March, 1871.

Mr. KELLEY. So that the bill did not drop out somewhere between here and the Senate.

Mr. COX. I know it dropped out.

Mr. KELLEY. It dropped out with the Congress.

Mr. COX. And you voted against it and made a good speech against it; I remember that. I made a speech for it.

Mr. KELLEY. I want you to tell the facts as they exist, and you profess to have examined the record.

Mr. COX. I will make it all right if I have made a mistake. What I want to say is this: On the last day of the session, when the bill was brought in here, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] opposed it; General Butler favored it, as a golden opportunity of statesmanship to obtain the carrying trade of Europe during the Franco-German war. Then and there this House, almost two-thirds republican, failed to respond to the demand of your President. It was the demand of economy and of enlarged intercourse with the commercial world. It was a demand, like that made in the Crimean war, which so redounded to the credit of our economy and to the profit of our people.

Mr. KELLEY. Then the House did not pass it. You are now stating the record.

Mr. COX. How is that? Just state that again.

Mr. KELLEY. You have just now stated that the House passed it, and yet you say the House did not pass it.

Mr. COX. It refused to lay the bill on the table; that was the vote, I think.

Mr. KELLEY. But the House did not pass it, as you have just stated.

Mr. COX. I believe that it did not pass it; but there was a test vote upon laying it on the table. I know it fell out.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes; and we all fell out together, for Congress expired.

Mr. GARFIELD. One of the opponents of that bill was the Representative from the city of New York, the gentleman's own colleague, Mr. Brooks——

Mr. COX. I know that.

Mr. GARFIELD. I greatly regretted to see him join in the opposition to the bill, for I was in favor of it.

Mr. COX. I know that; you have always acted in that line, and are one of the free-traders in this House, though you do not always tell it out.

Mr. KELLEY. Now, if you want to correct the RECORD, you must take out your misstatement that the bill passed the House.

Mr. COX. The idea I want to convey to the House is that the bill was favored by the House; that by a test vote the House refused to lay it on the table.

Mr. KELLEY. You said the House passed it; the RECORD says it did not.

Mr. COX. It is not material, the bill came up.

Mr. KELLEY. If it is not material, why did you state it? You do not always talk nonsense.

Mr. COX. I follow your example sometimes and say a great many superfluous things. [Laughter.] But I never interject things into your remarks when you speak, without your consent.

Mr. KELLEY. You do not?

Mr. COX. Without the consent of yourself and the Chair.

Mr. KELLEY. I cannot make any response to that.

Mr. COX. I know you cannot by the rules; for you are not on your feet. Now, what I wish to say and what I wish this House to understand is simply this: that there was an opportunity presented by the message of President Grant, and by the bill which was introduced, to give to the Western people an opportunity to ship their produce to Europe during the time of that war. That war interrupted as well the producing industries as the commercial relations of the countries involved in it. I call attention to the fact that during that war when there was a great call for flour, wheat, and corn from Europe this measure was not passed. The republican Congress adjourned, and even after the impressive speeches made by General Schenck and General Butler in favor of that bill, the commerce of the country failed to revive, by the acts of omission of the republican Congress, in despite of an urgent message from a republican President.

When I went home to New York City after that failure and saw those vessels laid up in Hoboken, I was satisfied by authentic proof, that there was a loss of $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 to the people of the West, who had abundant grain then to send to Europe to replace the lack of production of and by the nations who were fighting a great duello on the fields of Europe.

THE WORM IN THE ACORN.

The point I wish to make on my friend from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] is this: That to revive commerce you must either let us buy ships or build them. If you will not let us buy abroad, place a tax per ton on the ship and let it come in and raise our flag. But there is a difficulty. What? Because that lets in iron cheaper; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] and his protectionist friends fight that. This point reminds me a good deal of what I heard once when traveling in California. I saw some dead trees with holes perforated in them, and I asked my guide the meaning of them. He said they had been made by the woodpecker. I asked, "What for?" "To put in the acorn." "For food?" "Yes; for food." "Do the woodpeckers live on acorns here?" "No; they do not live on the acorn; but in winter a worm gets into the acorn, and they go for the worm." [Laughter.] That is the way with you gentlemen who are protectionists. You do not want a revenue tariff; you do not want free shipping; you do not want a revenue duty simply on tea and coffee. You will not stop smuggling by lower rates. You want, if possible, to raise taxes for protection, by bounties. That is the worm in the acorn.

DIPLOMACY AND RETRENCHMENT.

But, Mr. Chairman, I pass from that business and come to the more agreeable task of making a criticism, if I can, of our diplomatic relations. The gentleman from Ohio said he thought we might save $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 this year. He was for retrenchment. O, they are always for retrenchment till the bill comes along that really embraces retrenchment. When the military bill comes along they will howl for retrenchment—on the next bill! When the naval bill comes up they are for the next succeeding bill. When the Indian bill comes up they will perhaps take scalps for retrenchment—on the next bill! And when it comes to retrenchment on appropriations for harbors and rivers then you will hear what some Englishmen call the "shrieks of locality." On every bill brought here gentlemen will find that they are abstractly in favor of retrenchment while the great body of members on that side of the House, and some on this side, will be found voting the other way. Now, I propose to stand by my committee on this business.

UTILITIES OF DIPLOMACY.

But how are we treated abroad by our foreign representatives? I do not want to pay any more or any such salaries to men as are represented in our public reports. I except Mr. Marsh, Mr. Washburne, and several others. I have looked through and through this diplomatic correspondence to find some good or great thing for our edification as public men or for the advancement of commerce. I beg pardon; I picked up this morning a dispatch from Liberia, in which the eminent minister there says that they have had but one kind of currency in Liberia lately, that is the common copper cent, and that they propose to issue more money, paper money, and to make a loan of £30,000 sterling to float thegovernment. But the government did not float, and it did not float on this copper-cent coinage. That is instructive. How much do we pay for this instruction?

One of our ministers from Brazil writes to inform the sovereigns of America that the emperor opened the Legislature "in more than usual state, wearing a white-satin dress, his cape of plumes, a long velvet mantle and crown, and bearing his scepter even in his coach." This is extremely fine reading for a novel or a newspaper, but it illustrates the fact that toilet seems to be one of the great objects of diplomatic observation. How much do we pay for that? Then we read in the recent published dispatches that the Emperor of China died of smallpox, and that our minister wrote back to his successor that all the American people were sorry for it. He also informs us, and it is a useful piece of information for the medical profession to ponder, that the two court physicians, because they did not cure him, had lost one row of their buttons and their peacock tails! But our minister had not a kind word for the poor doctors, for were they not bound not only to make their kow-tow to the celestial majesty of the flowery kingdom but to his two majestic mothers! Again, we learn from a South American minister how they cure bull's-hides there.

I find also a dispatch from Greece where there is a description, and a very fine one, of the Grecian mode of voting for members of the chamber of deputies. They bring a long thing like a stove-pipe and the candidates hold up the stove-pipe. The suffragan takes a white ball or a black ball, runs his arm way down so as to keep his secret from all mankind and drops in an "ay" or a "no" for one of the candidates who holds up the stove-pipe. [Great laughter.] That is interesting for civil-service reform! He says also that if one hundred nominate a candidate for the chamber of deputies the candidate can run his stove-pipe anyhow, and this favors the third party men everywhere. It would suit some of our friends like our honorable professor over there who gave us the maxim Omne ignotum pro magnifico est. [Laughter.] If gentlemen cannot understand when a hand goes in that way, how it comes out in another way and elects some one whom nobody likes, it is only because it is too magnificent an improvement on our system sent to us from Greece at an expenditure of $10,000 a year. [Laughter.]

CHINESE AMNESTY.

But, Mr. Chairman, there are other things to be learned. I will pick up our correspondence with China. It is a wonderful correspondence about the young emperor, Tung. He argues in this way—I will have to read it because it touches something so near the other side. [Laughter.]

For more than ten years past, blessed with the counsels of maternal love, we have striven to reach the highest path. Happily it has been so, that wherever the armies of the state came, the [Taiping] rebels of Yueh (Kwangtung and Kwangsi) and the [Nienfi] banditti were vanquished and subdued before them, and the insurgents among the Miaotse and the Mohammedans in Yunnan, Kweichau, and Shensi have all been conquered and brought into submission.

[Laughter.]

Now that is pleasant reading, and I do love to read when we have to pay $17,500 for information. [Laughter.] I especially commend to the gentlemen who have not shown any inclination toward amnesty this extract:

Tranquillity has been everywhere restored; but, though the miseries of war have ceased, the injuries and wounds of our people are not yet healed, and whenever we think of them it drives away all sleep and repose.

This seems to have been an occasion for a centennial amnesty in China. [Laughter.]

It is equally our hope that all our ministers and servants, both civil and military, in all parts of the land, will unite in public-spirited and loyal efforts for the common good, each zealously discharging his allotted duty, that thus they may uphold for our adopted successor a more and more glorious rule. If this be done, the cravings of our breast will be assuaged. [Laughter.]

That, Mr. Chairman, is one of the Confucian sentiments we learn which is really useful. We ought to pay for it a large sum. [Laughter.] I should like very much to go a little further into this book. Let me here ask the Chairman how much time I have left.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has fifteen minutes remaining of his hour.

Mr. COX. My friend from Illinois when he was speaking passed over to me a most remarkable document. I should hardly believe it to be genuine but for the authentic source—the State Department itself. Gentlemen say that there has never been an inquiry or investigation as to this particular diplomatic business. There never was such a handsome raking as this State Department has received this session by this democratic committee of investigation. It never had it before or since I have been here. It ought to have been done before, and you gentlemen on the other side of the House ought to have done it and received the credit for it.

BOKER AND BIJOUTERIE.

I know gentlemen will vote for the bill after they hear that for a certain treaty about Turkey and its minister of foreign affairs we have paid 54,781 francs. Now, what was it paid for? To corrupt Turkish officials; to obtain from them a treaty? Comment is useless to this House on such a scandalous outrage upon morality. It was paid by Mr. Boker to Safvet Pasha, minister of foreign affairs in Turkey, and his son and household. But what for? To make a treaty. Did you ever see that treaty? It has never been published. There is a reference to it in the President's message, but you cannot find the treaty. Our minister, Mr. Boker, paid to Safvet Pasha, minister of foreign affairs, according to this account, 54,781 francs for himself and other Turkish officials to run a treaty through the Sublime Porte. [Laughter.] Now, what does that mean? You honest republicans ought to understand it. Omne ignotum pro magnifico est. [Laughter.] Just look at this item, the last one in this bill: "Four cake-bowls, round feet, style of Louis XVI, foliage-handles, with birds; four silver bowls, scalloped border, assorted to match centerpiece; four cast bay-trees, chiseled on the castings; chiseled garlands; flat channel, chiseled, in the center a bouquet of chiseled flowers, gilt and gold bottom, 3,777 francs." The whole thing was "chiseled." [Great laughter.] Certainly it was; but I should like to know who else was chiseled. [Laughter.]

Now let us look at the other items. Let me read this French. I wish I could do it better, but I never could understand English well enough in this House. [Laughter.] If the gentleman will only remember his wrongly quoted motto, "Omne ignotum pro magnifico est," I will read him only one item to satisfy that motto. [Laughter.] Here is the bill rendered to our State Department from Mr. Boker by "M. Mananian, fabricant joaillier, rue de Richelieu, No. 41, doit M. son excellence Monsieur Boker, Paris, le 6 juin 1875." [Laughter.] That means that Mr. Boker is excellent; and so he is. But his bill does not look so excellent. It amounts to 19,700 francs. And it is settled—"Pour acquit, Paris, le 8 juin 1875, M. Mananian." Here are some of the items: "Épingle de cravate, fer à cheval, pierres variées, 4,000 francs." Do you know what that is, gentlemen from the West? [Great laughter.] My friend from New England [Mr. SEELYE] knows what it is. It is a pin for a cravat in the form of an iron horse, with various stones set in it. [Laughter.] Four thousand francs. Nearly a thousand dollars for that locomotive, put as a breastpin in the cravat of a son of Safvet Pasha, the minister of foreign affairs. Perhaps he gave it to one of the houris in his harem. Here there is another item, "3 boutons de chemise en brillants, 4,000 francs." That is, three shirt-buttons. [Laughter.] Yes, let me say boldly, three shirt-buttons. [Continued laughter.] How will our hard-worked mechanics and farmers like these items?

Well, Mr. Chairman, gentlemen say that we laugh this bill out of court. We do not mean that. We simply mean to show up, after the modest and logical manner of the reductio ad absurdum, precisely how you have conducted the best-conducted Department in your Government. If this is done in the green tree, what will be done in the dry? If they can do this in a respectable Department, presided over by an ex-governor and an Ex-Senator from New York, a distinguished man, an honest man, and do this without accountability, what they will do in the Indian Department, God only knows. [Laughter.]

GREECE AND ITS DANCES.

Now, gentlemen, I will go to Greece, although there is hardly a grease spot left! [Laughter.] However, there is something very interesting in connection with Greece, which I would like to refer to. I do not think it has been exhausted altogether. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] anticipated me a little, as I was the first man to find out the interesting letters which he has quoted. My friend Judge HOLMAN also anticipated me, but he did not find, read, nor comment on the most interesting epistles.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Athens, March 8, 1875. (Received April 5.)

SIR: A magnificent ball took place at the palace on the 3d instant. On that occasion the American minister had the honor to be selected to lead a contra-dance with the queen.

A GRECIAN MINISTRY DEFENDED.

Now that is something that I like. It makes me wish to defend in one sense the minister to Greece. I will defend anybody that has been so abused as this minister. Why what do we not owe to Greece? Think of it! The land where "burning Sappho loved and sung," and all the rest of Byron's fine ode, which you, Mr. Chairman, rehearsed in your boyhood. Think of Athens—the eye of Greece, and the Piræus, which has been called the "eyesore of Greece." Think of the arts of war and peace which Greece illustrated two thousand years ago! Think of Marathon and Salamis, and the "ships by thousands" which used to lay below, but which do not lay around there at all now, especially with our starry flag at the mast! Think of Thermopylæ and her three hundred, of the Pyrrhic phalanx and Anacreon, Suli's rock and Sunium's marbled steep; and then, swan-like, die for love of Greece, after Byron's draught of Samian wine! Think of the Acropolis. Think of those old heroes that modern Greeks name their children after—Æschylus, Thersites, Agamemnon, and Ulysses—never forget Ulysses, [laughter]—Epaminondas, and Pericles, and Sophocles, and Alcibiades, and Themistocles, and Euripides, and all the other DD's belonging to the early days of ancient Greece. [Laughter.]

Yet, sir, as my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] well said, our representatives, when they go to Greece, go to the tomb of departed greatness. Greece gave art, science, logic, and poetry to the ages. She is entitled to a minister from the United States of America, not on account of any special living people that are there, or any special commerce which they have with us, for they only send us, I believe, from two to ten thousand pounds of Zante currants every year; but Greece has a nomadic population of goat-herds, and we ought to improve on a certain kind of goat that we have in this country. [Laughter.]

IDEAL GREECE AND REAL AMERICA.

Is there here any man who will not assist us to protect and raise Greece to her ancient fame? Let him read Clay and Webster, if not Plato and Aristotle. Let him read the catalogue of the Homeric heroes! True, her streams are dried up, her soil barren, her olive-trees cut up by the roots for fuel, and her very grass made the food of her nomadic goats; but is it not Greece? Some cynic may ask before voting appropriations for our minister, who honors the dead past and the great heroes of that dead past, "What is Cithera's isle to the grasshopper-despoiled West? What is Milos, whence the famous statue of Venus came, or Salamis with the fame of Themistocles, when Mississippi is under the ban and its plantations are overgrown with sedge-grass? What the Piræus, where Socrates questioned the sailors, or what the academy under whose olive-trees the divine Plato sat while the bees of Hymettus settled on his lips, when the Texas border is ravaged by greasers and American cattle driven to Cortina's ranches by the thousand? What are Morea's hills, with their golden and purple sunsets, when beyond our sunset, contractors cheat the Government and Indians on meat and flour? What the violet-wreathed city of Minerva, when in the great metropolis of New York, 'farther west,' the tenement-houses teem with skeleton starvelings? Let imagination paint in rainbow colors the verdureless and yellow isles of Greece and sing them again in Byron's muse, but what are these to the demoralized and overflowed bacon of Alabama? When there is sung the glories of Bacchus and the mazy dance of the Bacchantes, who is to tell the mysteries of the crooked juices of the maize of Illinois, Wisconsin, and Missouri?" [Laughter.]

And if, further, the same cynic asks why King George of Greece plays with his pet birds while the bandits prowl, plunder, and murder; if it is said that Greece is the land of ruins, brigands, and beggars, and the little kinglet of Schleswig-Holstein is held on his throne by other powers, may we not respond, "It is Greece, the Greece of Aristotle and Homer, to which we send expensive embassadors?"

We ought to go further in our pride and protection for this grave of greatness. We ought to bring out of the ruins of the Acropolis some of those rare works of art that were left by Lord Elgin when he surreptitiously carried off so many to the British Museum. I plead as well for art as for the poor inhabitants of Greece. They ought to be in some way or other protected by our minister. [Laughter.]

SAMOA.

There are many new members here who probably do not know that two years ago we had an Executive Document, No. 54 of the second session of the Forty-second Congress, sent here by a Colonel Steinberger, who went to what is called the Navigator Islands. He was on a special mission from our Government. I do not know just what it was for. Perhaps there was a land job in it. Omne ignotum pro mirifico. [Laughter.] But he went out to these islands, and there he was soon hand and glove with King Lunalilo. He is now premier. There he is now, sitting under the bread-fruit trees, with the little monkey clinging with prehensile grip to their limbs, and he (I do not mean the monkey) wrapped around with the star-spangled banner of our country; only seventy-five hundred miles from San Francisco, eight thousand miles from China, and four thousand miles from Juan Fernandez! There our banner floats! [Laughter.]

O, how proud we were when we knew that our banner was floating over those basaltic rocks, washed by the waves as they rolled over coral reefs, with fishes among them of all kinds and colors! Then to think that away off, where no good man had ever gone, except some of the Botany Bay shipwrecked convicts to convert the natives to our religion—how beautiful it was in this centennial year to feel that General Grant had sent out Colonel Steinberger to bring those islands within our own influence and confederacy! If we can do so much for such people who are so far off, why not jump from Samoa sixteen thousand miles to Greece, and there revive through our diplomacy its ancient glories under our centennial tutelage. [Laughter.]

GREECE RESUMED.

In Greece we have a minister whom I like. I do not want to see him dismissed. He is a man that can dance a contra-dance with the Queen, and such a queen as Queen Olga—a grand duchess of Russia! And Russia may almost be called the leading power of Europe. We should be proud to think of such a minister! How did they dance it?

Hands across and down the middle,
To the tune of flute and the fiddle.

[Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I have seen much promiscuous dancing. Byron refers to the Pyrrhic dances of classic Greece, but that dance is obsolete. I have seen the Kabyles in Northern Africa with their strange swaying dances. I have seen some dancing in the aisles of this House that forcibly reminded me of the Dervishes of the East. I have seen some ravishing dancing by the señoritas of Seville.

But, sir, I pause. We have here a gentle professor, [Mr. MONROE,] at one time a very good professor at Oberlin, and a good man. He is or was a very religious man. He is well educated, but did he know when he was speaking for Greece and its minister the other day and quoting its history—did he know that our minister there had been dancing a contra-dance? Did he know that he was thus desecrating the old religious Presbyterian principles? No, sir, I repudiate such an idea. How can he vote against Greece in this bill? [Laughter.]

DIPLOMATIC EATING, AND DRINKING, AND DRESS.

Sir, the letter which the gentleman from Illinois sent up to be read was not exactly read by the Clerk in the proper tones. I proceed to read it through:

The spacious salons were filled at half past nine, and the festivities continued until half past five in the morning. The arrangements throughout were of the most admirable character. An elaborate supper for eight hundred guests was laid in the royal salle à manger and in the two large adjoining rooms, while the ministers of state and the diplomatic corps were entertained by the King and Queen in the beautiful private apartments of their majesties.

I would like to know what they had to eat on that festive occasion. What did they drink? Was it champagne or was it Burgundy? Did they have imported from Spain the rare Montillado? Did they have Rendisheimer, or did they have Hockheimer or some other "heimer" from the Rhine? [Laughter.] What were they drinking? Was it the vin D'Asti from Italy or Tokay from Hungary? What was their menu? Was it drawn from Apicius or the "mouth officers" of Lucullus? Was it inspired by Brillat Savarin or Delmonico? I think some man on the republican side of the House who is interested in retrenchment ought to have the question raised and inquiry made as to what was going on on that occasion in respect to the edibles and drinking; for I hold that the first duty of an American diplomat is to drink nothing but pure old American Bourbon whisky. [Laughter.]

Moreover, the utility of this wonderful diplomatic system which I am now defending, for I think it will prove of great utility, is the right to have inquiry as to the peculiar diplomatic dress our minister wore when he danced with the Queen of Greece.

Did he wear a spike-tailed coat; were his hands covered with graceful kids; were they of the Alexandrine pattern, and was his hair parted in the middle? [Laughter.] How was the Queen dressed? How did she manage that white-satin dress so as not to take the color from her cheeks, as represented in another interesting dispatch? We want to know all about it; how long was her train; and, if not, why not? [Laughter.]

ART AND GREECE.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I had the other day a little troublesome matter with my friend from Maine [Mr. HALE] as to which I wish to express my regret. I called him by an endearing epithet, but I felt a little bad about it. I went to the Corcoran Art Gallery on Saturday to relieve myself from this feeling.

I never felt the necessity of keeping a minister at Greece until I walked, thoughtful, silent, among the mutilated plaster casts of the Corcoran Gallery on Saturday. There were orators without lungs, statesmen without brains, soldiers without arms, and Venuses without robes. [Laughter.] Here was a torso Demosthenes and a one-eyed Homer; there was a Theseus garroting a spavined Centaur. The gentleman from Kentucky will understand what a spavined Centaur is. [Laughter.] All about were the fauns, satyrs, Apollos, and Dianas which Greece gave to art and art to the ages. Although the only art of modern Greece consists in the ransoming of travelers from brigands, and the farming out of revenues for the sick man of the Levant, and feeding goats, yet that is a strong reason for a minister to look after art, brigands, and revenue.

If the British Queen—whose empire is based on the wisdom and the rocks of ages, and whose star and course of empire is eastward through her newly acquired Suez Canal to her hundreds of millions in India, and whose footsteps of empire are marked at Malta, Corfu, and in the isles of Greece—could not protect her subjects from brigandage and murder within sight of the Acropolis, does it not become our duty, as the mighty limb of her magnificent trunk, to throw our shadow over that sterile soil where Marathon looks on the sea! Is not this our bounden duty this centennial year? Are we not inviting all the nations to our carnival of industry and jubilee of freedom. What would that interesting occasion be without a wooden horse from Greece within thy gates, O city of Brotherly Love!

Moreover, do we not reach out to other isles than those of Greece and other lands remote? Does not Massachusetts, through an honored son and an ex-member of Congress, give law to the realm of King Kalakaua? Has not our vessel, with our proud starry flag, borne a Pennsylvanian, Colonel Steinberger, to the distant Samoan group of the southwestern seas, eight thousand miles from our coast, near the tropic of Capricorn? Has he not there eaten of the bread-fruit with the kings of the group and, a group of kings, made himself premier over their councils and king of the ex-Cannibal Islands? If we can do this in the isles of King Lunalilo, amid the ancient vesicular lava-beds, amagladaloids, and basalt, where, over coralline ledges, amid which disport fish banded and spotted with green and crimson, the wild waves are singing our everlasting glory hallelujah; why may we not reach out from Pago-Pago and the slopes of Upolu and Savaii to the land where Homer ruled as his demesne and Sappho sang her sad refrain to the Ægean, into whose bosom she sprang and from whose bosom her favorite deity arose. [Laughter.]

If we can use the contingent fund, as we have, to reach Pago-Pago and its interesting converts to polygamous Christianity, why may we not extend an enterprising rule and roving into that land where Pericles ruled, Demosthenes spoke, Sophocles sung, and even Paul preached? Did we not last year, to gratify an Ohio member, appropriate thousands for a new survey of Judea? And, if so, why may not Mars Hill have its geologist and the Morea its photographs?

GREEK COMMERCE.

Gentlemen may tell us that we have no commerce with Greece, and therefore require no minister there. Gentlemen may say that our ships and clippers no longer plow the historic waves, rendered classic by the prows of Ulysses and the pinnaces of Agamemnon. True, our ship-building is a myth; but Greece is the land of myths. True, the decadence of our shipping calls for little or no men-of-war; but what an interesting study for our minister are the men of war who went out to take Troy forty-five hundred years ago and besought and besieged that city till the young men went west! But is it not a strong reason for the encouragement of our navigation? If we had our olden commerce, there would be no need of its fostering. We must have ancient Greece to teach us the art of navigation and revive our shipping!

By the latest returns up to September 30, 1875, for three months we had only two ships, with eight sailors apiece, which cleared for Greece. It is not recorded that they ever returned. But no matter for that. Let us encourage emigration. During the past fifty-five years, from 1821 to 1875, we had two hundred and eighty-three descendants of Epaminondas and Socrates come to our shores, being four persons and four-fifths of a person on an average per annum, distributed from Passamaquoddy to Paso del Norte. Now, when immigration is falling off, it is high time to reach out the hand to the heroes of Thermopylæ and Missolonghi. Let us bring to our shores the honored scions—thus gloriously quoted by Mr. Read, our minister, in his dispatch, to wit:

Mavrocordato, Kolokotronis, Botzaris, Capo d'Istria, and many more which long ago became household words in America, have now in Greece living illustrations in the second and third generations. These representatives of a glorious past pace to-day beneath the paintings which tell in graphic ways their ancestors' heroic story.

We can make Solons out of them when war does not summon them to its gory field!

I saw in the gallery remains of Greece in plaster of Paris. There was Demosthenes; and let me state here confidentially [laughter] that he bears a strong resemblance to my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.] [Laughter.] And now I come back to the House of Representatives I see that Greece is not dead; that she is still a living Greece, living in plaster of Paris right in the city of Washington.

I will go further. I think we ought to have a minister to all other obsolete and blasé places. Why not have a minister of the same rank at Herculaneum, at Pompeii, and at all those places to which we resort as a matter of course and curiosity?

Mr. SPRINGER. To Nineveh.

Mr. COX. Where?

Mr. SPRINGER. Nineveh.

Mr. COX. Yes, to Nineveh, perhaps the most eligible situation on the globe. [Laughter.] I would prefer a consul to Nineveh for certain reasons which I need not mention. [Renewed laughter.]

TRIPOLI, TURKEY, AND OUR MINISTER.

That reminds me of something I intended to discuss. I was saddened to read in these dispatches that our friend Mr. Maynard had been rather snubbed by the State Department because of a little matter to which I will briefly call the attention of the House. It is our duty here as well to protect our absent members as those present, just as my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] protected Judge Bingham the other day in such an eloquent manner. I would protect Mr. Maynard from the harsh criticism passed upon him in one of these papers. How did the criticism upon him originate? I will tell you. There is a sort of hermaphrodite country called Tripoli; it does not know whether it is a part of Turkey or of Egypt or of Algiers or of the Desert of Sahara, which is soon to be flooded.

We have no minister there, but we have a consul-general, Mr. Vidal. Last year or year before last he wrote a dispatch, which was quoted in this House to show that our Protestant missionaries ought not to waste their time in Tripoli or in the territories of the oi barbaroi of the Greeks. He said the place for Protestant propagandism was in Bulgaria. The old New York Presbyterian Observer came out and read this consul a lesson. It said: "Why do you as a consul of the United States undertake to direct our missionary enterprises? What is that to you? Where do you get your power?" Mr. Vidal had urged that there were a great many slave-traders bringing slaves from Soudan and taking them to Constantinople and putting them in the harems of these bashaws of many tails. This brought Mr. Vidal into all sorts of trouble, and this book shows that he retired from his consulate and his companions to a little place remote from the city and near the sea. One day a Turkish sailor wended his way up to his kitchen to light his cigarette. Mr. Vidal, with that patriotism which becomes an American abroad, proud of his flag although it covers no commerce, rushed for that sailor and tripped him up. He had the spirit of Decatur who cut out the Philadelphia from that port. But the sailor stood up to Vidal and a contest ensued. He rushed to Malta, appealed to Mr. Maynard, and Mr. Maynard appealed to Washington.

But I must be precise. Here is the reproof, which it hurts my heart to reproduce. On page 1316 of the diplomatic papers, "Mr. Fish to Mr. Maynard," under date of November 9, 1875, writes thus, and harshly:

This subject was fully discussed in my former dispatch, and I allude particularly to it in this connection in order that you may recognize its significance and the importance of being controlled in the settlement of this affair, and in all our negotiations connected therewith, exclusively by our treaty with Tripoli.

For these reasons it would have been better if, in your note to Safvet Pasha, you had not referred to our treaty with the Ottoman government as securing our consul against the indignity of proceedings against him by the local authorities for an alleged misdemeanor. The "most-favored nation" clause in our treaty with Tripoli secures to the United States consul all the rights and privileges accorded to the representatives of other foreign powers. Having appealed to our treaty with Tripoli, we cannot, in the settlement of this question, take our treaty with the Porte at all into consideration.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Many MEMBERS. Go on! Go on!

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the time of the gentleman will be extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. I thank the House for its indulgence. Mr. Maynard suited the Turkish mission better than any man I know. He had the grave, deliberate, and majestic manner which we are told by Théophile Gautier (in his volume on Constantinople, just issued, page 156) belongs to the Turk, who never hurries himself, except in the presence of death. How sad he must have been at the treatment which his first little effort at diplomacy received from the State Department, his first effort to put things into shape for this consulate that had no commerce to take care of and was always in trouble. I see him as he retires to the cemetery of Scutari. There, amid the gravestones that are capped with the turban of Moslem, he sits amid the ashes of despair.

With all the propriety of deportment, he is sitting cross-legged sipping his Mocha and smoking his chibouk, until addressed by some bashaw of his acquaintance in these words: "How is it with you, my bashaw from Tennessee? Thou lookest sad to-day. What has gone amiss with thee, my brother?" "I have heard from the great mogul of New York, and he has blamed me for that which I have written, and I am unhappy therefor." "Turn your eyes up to these cypress-trees which weep with you, and with the dead near you; cast your eyes toward Mecca; bow your head with your fez cap three times, and you may be happy. Bishalla, go bragh! Brother Maynard; Mahomet is his prophet. Be just unto all men; sin not. Write not home anything encouraging about radicalism or Ku-Klux; be honorable, be just, and you will be happy. Allah is great, and Mahomet is his prophet. Rememberest thou not that one star goeth around another star, and that a star with a long tail swishes around the sun and goes and comes at intervals; comes in and goes out like eternal day and eternal night? Let the star with the long tail spin! Allah is great, and Mahomet is his prophet." [Laughter.]

And thus our friend will be consoled.

HOW TO REVIVE COMMERCE.

Why, gentlemen, to end this speech and to end it at once, you cannot revive commerce by your petty, rascally consular system, as my friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has developed it to you to-day. You have to make a cause for it here. Commerce does not depend on consuls. Commerce depends on your laws, or rather the repeal of your laws. Take off your burdens; take off your taxes. Then commerce will come; and the great art of ship-building, now almost obsolete in this country, so that there is no more apprenticeship to it, will revive again, and with it the returns which commerce always gives to nations.

But we have other and greater elements than that of consular relations, connected with commerce. My friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] in his grand survey of the Pacific referred to them. We have the elements of steam and electricity, drawing nations closer together; Stephenson and Bessemer helping on land; Watt and Fulton on the sea; Morse everywhere. Why do they help commerce? They call attention to the source of supply from the source of demand and vice versa. In Chicago the price of grain in Liverpool and London is a matter of hourly intelligence. Why, sir, in Utica, New York, where there is a cheese exchange, every time a man brings a cheese into Utica he looks at the bulletin to see the price of gold or cheese in Liverpool. We are drawing the world together. Iron aided by steam, with its great arms, is breasting the mobile elements of the ocean while electricity is sending its message.

I can remember going, years ago when I was a boy, to the district of my honorable friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to look at a new paper-machine there. It was the wonder of the time. My father had built the first paper-mill west of the Alleghany Mountains. He followed the old plan of making paper in molds, by vats. I worked as a paper-maker before I became a blacksmith or a Congressman. [Laughter.] I understood thoroughly that business. I went there and I saw that machine. By the old hand-process about one hundred pounds of paper was made per day; now a machine will turn out two thousand pounds in the same time. A machine will convert a stream of fluid pulp into paper, dry and polish it, and cut it into sheets; the time consumed in converting the pulp is two minutes—the old process was eight days. Steam, electricity, paper—newspapers and all—are to-day revolutionizing and reviving commerce. But for these elements all your consulates amount to nothing.

It is said by philosophers that the smallest atom—even an atom so small that Tyndall could not express it; an atom so small that it has no upper nor under side—it is said that even the tiny love drop in the bottom of the little Alpine flower down amid the glaciers has its effect upon the rings of Saturn, and perhaps upon some other "rings" that I need not mention in this community. [Laughter.] But whatever may be its effect, it is no more in the great forces of the universe as connected with our practical life than is your little consul in the revival of commerce, trade, and navigation.

The Hanseatic League made commerce without consuls. The Venetian argosies and the Dutch Indiaman carried for and enriched their country without consuls. Transportation is the secret. It brings the prairie to the seaboard. It has made for us seventy-four thousand miles of railroads, with a gross receipt of five hundred millions. When it is rash and grasping, as in 1873, it made its tax on cereals to you of the West—at five cents a bushel, $45,000,000.

Learn from England. Encourage iron and steam. Take off your great taxes and the multitude of them. Give encouragement to our people to sell abroad. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] spoke about our cotton trade reviving. I know it is reviving to some extent; but last year $75,000,000 worth of cotton was sold by England where we should have had the market. We are, it is true, selling some abroad now, and I hope we shall sell more. If our tariff bill passes, with the aid of steam, with the aid of electricity, with the aid of fair dealing, with a reconciled country North and South, East and West, and with the blessing of a centennial year, and divine goodness, we may have another kind of jubilee in which there will be an interdependence of men and nations and an independence among men from bad government everywhere on our star. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I did not know how funny our diplomatic and consular relations were. I have discovered that the discussion of them is, to use a slang phrase, "as good as a circus," indeed as good as a circus with two clowns of such equal merit that one does not know at the shallow follies of which he has laughed most. During the fourteen years I have been here, realizing the fact that no man can study every question presented in all its details, it has been my habit to follow committees, and, when one of them reported a bill to the House and brought it up for discussion, to listen to their statements of facts, their arguments, and to be largely governed by them because I believed (and usually the discussion of the bill confirmed the belief) that the members of the committee had studied the subject, understood something about it, and had reported the bill in good faith.

I listened yesterday to the statesmanlike speech of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] and drank it in gratefully, for it was replete with well-digested facts. It showed that he understood the subject he was discussing in all its relations and bearings. And I came to the House this morning to be further instructed, having heard that elaborate speeches were to be made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] in support of the bill he had criticised with such intelligent discrimination. Having heard them, I am constrained to say that I shall shrink from the advice of the committee whose bill they champion, whose views they sustain. Enlightened by their remarks, I cannot look upon this as a serious bill. The course they have pursued convinces me that it is a mere political dodge, a peg upon which to hang sophistical suggestions in favor of economy, that they may go with their platitudes, plausibilities, and gross jokes, unfit by their coarseness for this Hall, to the more vulgar part of their constituencies in an appeal against the action of the republican Senate in maintaining, as I believe it will do, the well-devised diplomatic and consular system which, whatever may be its defects, has grown up as the outgrowth of time, and been developed, shaped, nurtured, and cherished by the wisest and best statesman of the democratic and opposing parties.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] made an unfortunate allusion to a former member from Pennsylvania, whom he honored overmuch in saying that, by referring to the gold spoons which were part of the furniture of the Executive Mansion, he had overthrown Van Buren's administration. That administration, sir, was bound to fall, and Charles Ogle's mean and vulgar recital of the implements used at the presidential table on state occasions did not assist in its overthrow. It however did other things, sir. It made an honored family ashamed of its name and caused every Pennsylvanian to blush when "Spooney Ogle" was spoken of in his hearing.

There is scarcely a man in either party in Western Pennsylvania who does not remember the Ogle family and its history before its pride was extinguished by the mean and base pretense of economy of the man who sought entrance to the White House to carry with vulgar exaggeration into a political campaign the details of its social life on state occasions. General Jack Ogle, of Somerset, who was known all over Western Pennsylvania and largely over the western country as the "frosty son of thunder," was a man of eccentricities, but he was a man of character, integrity, and pride. When he went among his mountaineer constituents his utterances swayed their mind and will as the storm sways the branches of the oaks of the forest. For many years he had been a vital power, but he never raised his head in public after his kinsman gave the gentleman from Illinois a precedent for his speech of to-day. He felt the degradation of the family name and retired from public life.

The speeches we have heard, sir, may be said to have concerned all things and other things besides; I shall not therefore pretend to follow the gentlemen in their devious windings and wanderings. But few of their remarks had serious relation to the consular and diplomatic bill. They meant to darken counsel on that subject. When the gentleman from Illinois spoke of the crimson mat upon the marble floor he exhibited his profound knowledge of eastern life by asking how the marginal marble could be seen through the crimson mats which lay at the feet of the ladies, and added the suggestion that he had probably seen through a glass darkly. The thought was suggestive. But, sir, there was withall an honest, earnest, under purpose in both speeches. It was not economy with which the gentleman from Illinois began or retrenchment with which the gentleman from New York began. It was by the darkening of counsel to make campaign documents at whatever risk of danger to the commerce of the country, and to argue, in advance of the report of a bill relating thereto, a question about which, if the gentlemen will pardon me, I will take the liberty of saying they know as little as they seem to know about our consular and diplomatic service.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] told us, from his imagination purely as he was compelled to admit, how this House at the instance of the President had hastened to pass a bill allowing the purchase and registry of foreign-built ships. He has been here sixteen years, he says, and gentlemen can scan his record, and the record of the House, scrutinizing votes—standing, by tellers, and by yeas and nays—and find they all disprove the statement, though he said he had just been examining the record of the vote by yeas and nays to ascertain how the gentleman from Minnesota voted. The proposition was upon the recommendation of the President, submitted to the House on July 15, 1870. The session was to expire that day, and the Speaker's hammer came down while the discussion was proceeding; and his other facts or allegations seem to me to be almost as well founded as this one that we passed any such bill.

Thus he tells us that ship-building has come to be almost a lost art, is almost obsolete. Why, I tell you upon official authority that since 1870 not four branches of industry have so rapidly grown within our country as iron-ship building under the beneficent influence of protection to American industry. We are building ships for our own use and for exportation to float foreign flags in the ownership of citizens of foreign countries. I speak not wildly on the subject. The iron ships which now bear American commerce over the Pacific Ocean, grander in their proportions when launched within a year than any other commercial vessels then floating, were built by John Roach & Sons on the Delaware, in the district of my friend and colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] who represents Chester and Delaware Counties. The only line of iron ships that bear the American flag across the Atlantic Ocean in foreign commerce were built by William Cramp & Sons on the same river, the Delaware, in the fifth district of Pennsylvania.

Under free trade and hard money there was no chance to develop either the resources of the country or to engage in the construction of ships. In 1868 the total tonnage of iron ships of American build in our country was 2,801 tons; in 1869 it was 3,545; in 1870, 7,602; in 1871, 15,480; and it has increased with increasing ratio each year. The municipal authorities of the city of Philadelphia have recently obliterated several important streets for some distance west from the wharf-line to make unbroken space for an iron-ship yard, which will begin work with an engagement for one hundred iron steamers, many of which will carry the mineral wealth of Pennsylvania to the islands of the sea, where it is needed as fuel and machinery in the production of sugar and other commodities.

The gentlemen say reduce your customs duties in order to increase your revenues. To which I rejoin, read the financial and industrial history of your country, gentlemen, before you undertake to teach or persuade. Yes, read the history of your own country in its official statistics. Note what its revenue has been under the varying tariffs that have succeeded each other. You will find that under low duties the revenue always falls off, and that under the highest tariffs the revenue has steadily increased. And there is a philosophic reason for these results. They are not accidental coincidences. Under a protective tariff our people are employed; labor and skill are in demand; the rate of wages increases. They are able to supply their wants. Nay more, they are able to gratify their desires. Supplying their wants and gratifying their desires, they purchase dutiable goods imported in exchange for those we export.

Do not rely upon my statement merely; I have before me the official figures of the customs-revenue received in every year from the foundation of the Government, beginning with 1791, when the first tariff went into effect, to the close of 1869. The war forced us to adopt high tariff duties. The protective tariff was not accepted as a theory but as a necessity. We increased duties three times, in 1861, in 1862, and in 1864. And with what effect upon the public revenues? Prior to 1861 they had in but four years exceeded $55,000,000; in 1861 they reached but $39,582,186; in 1862, $49,056,398; in 1863, when protection began to operate, they came to $69,059,642; in 1864, to $102,316,153; in 1866 they went to $179,046,630; in 1867, to $176,417,811; in 1868, to $164,464,599; in 1869, to $180,048,426. And just in proportion as duties have been reduced and the prices of our commodities also been reduced by a contraction of the currency increasing numbers of our people have been forced to practice economy and retrenchment by reason of enforced idleness, and the revenue has diminished.

We can never, said the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] sell our manufactured goods until we cheapen them, so that the people in South America for example can buy them at 100 per cent. less than other countries will sell. Sir, how will we make a profit by selling our goods at 100 per cent. less than others?

Mr. SPRINGER. I said 100 per cent. less than other countries sold them at.

Mr. KELLEY. That is precisely what I said the gentleman had stated. To sell goods at 100 per cent. less will in some instances require us to pay people for taking them. We will be giving a bonus to people to accept them.

Mr. SPRINGER. What I meant to say was a hundredth part of 1 per cent.

Mr. KELLEY. O, a hundredth part of 1 per cent. That is another thing.

Now let me tell the gentleman that, if he will study the commerce of his country through its official statistics and the leading trade journals, he will find that we are selling iron goods in Birmingham and other leading iron districts of England, that we are selling cotton goods in Manchester, that we are selling saws in London, (and through London to every part of the British Islands,) that we have driven almost all commodities produced chiefly from the useful metals out of Canada or compelled British manufacturers to sell them there without profit; and that we have done this by virtue of the protective system which made wages so high that the inventive genius of man has been applied to the production of labor-saving machinery for use in every art, trade, and mystery. By this means we have lessened the cost of production and improved the quality of our wares and fabrics.

But protection, by thus stimulating the development of our multiform raw materials, made such a demand for labor as raised wages and tempted millions of immigrants to come and dwell among us and pay duties and taxes upon the imported and domestic articles they consume. Under free trade and hard money our immigration, which had once attained the dimensions of 250,000 in a single year, shrunk away so that in 1861 and 1862 the total immigration was less, in each of those years of free trade and hard money, than 92,000, while, under the influence of the protective system and the "rag-baby," as our national currency has been derisively called from the very steps of the presidential mansion, it grew up to 449,483 in 1872 and 437,004 in 1873. Under the influence of contraction and the dread of free trade, consequent upon the incoming of the democratic party as a majority in this House, with the threat of a return to low duties, it is shrinking away again, and last year amounted to but 191,231. And in the six months of the current fiscal year that have elapsed there is a further shrinkage of about 30 per cent. as compared with the same period of last year. Go on, gentlemen, and pass the bill you are in such hot haste to advocate, and the consequence will be that the farmers of Illinois will burn their corn, as they did in the old days of free trade and hard money, though the fields upon which it will grow are underlaid with coal at a depth ranging from but thirty to two hundred and sixty feet. Strike down the workshops of the country, reduce wages so as to prohibit immigration, buy your manufactured goods from foreign nations, so that employment in England, France, and Germany, at good wages, can readily be had, while the machinery of the United States stands idle, and our working-people are beggared, and where then will be the farmer's market? Who will come into the new States of the West and Northwest, or swarm into the fertile and sunny South to add value to land and promote the improvement thereof. The mere introduction of that bill by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means and its reference to that committee have already paralyzed the few industries that our folly in contracting the money of the country had left in a comparatively prosperous condition.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me a word?

Mr. KELLEY. Not just at this time.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] spoke of the miserable Spanish republics. Miserable! Why are they miserable? He told us that England had a mortgage upon their territory and their custom-revenues. And why are they thus miserable and enslaved? It is because their affairs have been managed on the theories of the gentlemen who have harangued us so to-day with such flippancy.

They have been governed by free-trade principles. Their rulers have believed that it was better that their workshops should be beyond the Atlantic. They had no local-credit system by which domestic exchanges could be facilitated. Their money was gold and silver. They had not reached that point of progress when credit not only supplements but substitutes metallic money, a thing of intrinsic value and therefore liable to be withdrawn from them by foreign creditors. Producing only raw materials they have been unable to accumulate capital or aggregate population; and whether they wanted a railroad or a few wagon-wheels, whether they wanted pins or needles or fine carriages, or whatever other manufactured articles, they went to foreign countries and got them made, thus depriving their own people of employment. They preferred that their work should be done by the people of England, France, or Germany; and so it has come to pass that free trade has exhausted their resources and forced them to repudiate their national obligations. Some of them have declared their inability to pay interest already due. This is so with two or three of them already; and with growing demands for interest further repudiation must come. It may be postponed by making new loans out of which to pay interest; but the ultimate repudiation of all their debts is inevitable. When the interest on a foreign debt exceeds the annual profits of the people creditors must suffer.

But I ask gentlemen whether somebody does not hold a mortgage on our custom-duties? Are we in a position to taunt these exhausted, poor republics and scoff at their misery? Where do our custom-duties go? Who holds a statutory mortgage upon them? The foreign holders of American bonds that require us each year to ship twice as much gold as we can mine and all the silver we can mine at whatever price they will give us for it, and to supplement them with corn and cotton, with tobacco and petroleum, and, sadder than all, with other bonds and mortgages. Ay! when you come to ask that the legal-tender money of the country shall be received for duties you will be told that those duties are mortgaged, that a statute has declared that you shall not touch a dollar of them until you have paid the holders of your gold-bearing bonds, and I fear that if you persist in the reckless course of issuing them we are now pursuing the day may come when some member of the British Parliament or of the French Chamber will enlarge the language of the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] and say "the miserable republics of America." The unlimited purchase of foreign productions with interest-bearing bonds will bankrupt any nation, let its people be as proud as they may.

To drop from a grave question to a very trivial one, let me say there has been much discussion as to the costume in which Franklin appeared at court. Sir, I have had opportunities of examining the best portraits of Franklin and was delighted, on entering the Wadsworth Athenæum at Hartford, Connecticut, to be able to examine the suit in which he appeared at the court of France. It was a suit of magnificent embroidered brocade coat, vest, and breeches. When Franklin represented the tax-payers, the people, the patriots of America, they were all in earnest. They knew his power and wished him to exert it as best he could in their service. He loved plain dress, but he adapted himself to the usages of the court to which he was accredited. They did not make his costume the subject of demagogical speeches that would discredit him with even the ignorant or meanly penurious portion of their constituents. They sent him and other ministers abroad to exercise power and influence, and this could best be done by mingling in social life and manifesting becoming interest in the affairs of the people and Government, and creating a good impression of himself and his country; and I have no doubt that many of the foolish expressions which have been read from the published reports of our diplomatic correspondence have been prepared with a view of their being sent back to the country from which they came. Resort to such simple means of propitiating the good-will of nations is not a novelty. It has often been suggested by our State Department, by Mr. Seward in his time, by Mr. Marcy who, though he protested against court-dress and insisted upon a simple suit of black, always encouraged our representatives, to cultivate social amenities and to transmit to the Department things that would be agreeable when read by the court to which the minister was accredited. I agree with gentlemen that Mr. J. Meredith Read carried this species of amiable diplomacy to excess.

I am also willing to go further and say that I do not think it important, except traditionally, to retain a mission to Greece. It is a declining country. I am, however, unwilling to slight it, when I remember that some of the distinguished members of Mr. Monroe's cabinet were anxious to send a fleet to lay upon her classic shores and maintain her integrity at the cost of war. I am unwilling to slight it, when I remember that among the richest of the treasures of our parliamentary eloquence are the magnificent bursts of Henry Clay in behalf of prostrate Greece.

Greece has a traditional right to claim sympathy and, if need be, aid from the American people. To blot Greece out would be to blot out a historic reminder of the courage and foresight of the great men who constituted the Cabinet of James Monroe and of the eloquence of Henry Clay.

I am not upon the Committee on Appropriations, and therefore probably should not have thrust myself into this discussion. But discovering the double drift of the speeches of to-day—the one to make ad captandum stump speeches for the coming campaign and the other to pave the way for an assault upon that system which has made us great and is advancing our relative greatness—I was impelled to enter my protest. In doing so let me turn to the statesman-like speech of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] to which I have already referred.

"Give us free trade," howl these two advocates of economy and retrenchment. Now let us look at the question. I have shown you the effect of protection upon the revenues of the country, and I tell you that to reduce the duties on imports as largely as that bill proposes would bring the Government to repudiation. I turn to the speech of the gentleman from New York, made yesterday, and find that from 1790 to 1830 our whole foreign commerce amounted to but $115,000,000 in any one year. In 1840 it had come to be $200,000,000. Then we gave it the spur of protection, the tariff of 1842, which lasted for four years and more in practice quickened a thousand industries. It enabled us to enter the markets of the world with various classes of saws, with but-hinges, the ordinary household furniture for doors and windows, and many other varieties of hardware.

Then came the discovery of California gold, and our commerce went up to $708,000,000. In 1865, with the Southern States withdrawn, without cotton or tobacco, our foreign commerce ranged at $640,000,000. It was then feeling the full effects of the third increase of tariff duties. From 1865 to 1870 it jumped up to $875,000,000, and from 1870 to 1874 it went to $1,265,000,000.

In 1869 I had the honor of addressing an audience in San Francisco. A gentleman recurring to my well-known protectionist views said to me with satirical emphasis, "You will do well to let our merchants know how you account for the decline in our commerce." I accepted his challenge, and in the course of my remarks stated and proceeded to verify the statement that our foreign commerce, instead of declining, was, under the influence of the protective system, growing so rapidly, in comparison with that of England, that it took but an ordinary arithmetician to calculate the date at which the foreign trade of the United States would exceed that of the British Isles; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] in a general way confirms that statement. Having given tables showing the growth of the commerce of each country, he said:

In 1874 the aggregate imports and exports of Great Britain amounted to £667,733,165. Her population was 32,412,010. Her foreign trade, therefore, was at the rate of £21 or $100 in gold per head of population. In the same year the aggregate imports and exports of the United States amounted to $1,265,719,964, which, allowing a population of 40,000,000, gives a foreign trade of $30.66⅔ per head, or less than one-third of the British per capita rate. Those who know the natural resources of this country will not require to be told that we have a better basis for foreign commerce than Great Britain, and that if she can maintain a trade of $100 per capita, we shall surely arrive at the same result if we take the same means to secure it, and remove all artificial impediments from its growth. The figures may be bewildering, but they may be realized, and would amount to $4,000,000,000 per annum. The foreign trade of Great Britain already exceeds $3,000,000,000. Few persons, however, realize the rapid development of our foreign commerce since 1840. Prior to that date its growth was very slow.

1800	83, 962, 794
1810	103, 375, 370
1820	108, 125, 611
1830	115, 951, 570
1840	202, 846, 841
1850	300, 133, 472
1860	708, 422, 506
1865	640, 184, 622
1870	875, 708, 616
1874	1, 265, 719, 964

Those who have been accustomed to talk of the decay of American commerce can study this table with profit. There has in fact been no development in any age or in any country comparable to it. Compare it, for example, with the increase in Great Britain since 1865, an era of unexampled prosperity:

Year.	Imports.	Exports.	Total.
1865	£271, 072, 285	£258, 831, 576	£489, 913, 861
1870	303, 257, 493	244, 080, 577	547, 338, 070
1874	370, 082, 701	297, 650, 464	667, 733, 165

Between 1865 and 1874 British foreign commerce therefore increased about 40 per cent. while that of the United States increased nearly 100 per cent.

How long will it take a steady increase at the rate of but 40 per cent. on the part of one nation and of 100 per cent. on the part of another to bring them to an equality? The existing difference being given it is a simple matter of calculation. How and why is it that we are gaining thus? It is because we have studied the facts of history, and have seen that England, by protective duties, by prohibitory laws, by the prohibition of the exports of her machinery or of models thereof, by denying the right of English skilled workmen to emigrate, built up her industries, and, from having been derided for selling a whole skin for a sixpence and buying back the dressed tail for a shilling, had made herself the great manufacturing nation of the world and assumed the power that always accompanies that condition, that of the great commercial nation of the world. We are following her early example, and if we persist may hasten the day when we may safely adopt her later and present policy.

She has come to that condition in which free trade may be best for her general interests. I admit that there are times in the history of nations when the most absolute free trade is the best thing for their laboring-people. When a nation is young, its people living in the wilderness, with no factories, with no developed mines, with no models of the best products of art and ingenuity, free trade may stimulate the creation of industries, and procure patterns to be copied and to be used, and thus be best for the nation.

But with the growth of the useful arts protection becomes necessary, and with these fully developed free trade may again become the better policy. When all the resources of a country are developed, when the people know what they can and cannot produce, when by large accumulations of capital and improved machinery they are able to produce more cheaply than other nations, they may invite the competition of free trade. They will thus get cheaply the raw materials they cannot produce, and if the free trade be reciprocated, they will, in accordance with the advice of Lord Henry Brougham, then, in 1815, Mr. Brougham, strangle rival industries in their infancy and prevent the development of competition. Neither the first nor last of these conditions is ours. We are but ascertaining the extent and variety of our resources. We are a debtor nation. Our capital is not our own. It is borrowed. We need the help of millions of immigrants, and must invite them by high wages and steady work, secured by adequately protective duties.

My remarks, Mr. Chairman, have been apart from the bill before the committee, for which I apologize to you and to gentlemen who remain to hear me. But in view of the hilarity and I am sorry to say the gross vulgarity that characterized the preceding addresses, the only earnest part of either being that aimed at our protective system, I felt myself justified in doing as I have done.

I yield, if I have any time remaining, to my friend from Mississippi, [Mr. LYNCH.]

Mr. RANDALL. I do not know that the gentleman has the floor to yield it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's hour has not expired.

Mr. RANDALL. How soon will it expire?

The CHAIRMAN. There are fifteen minutes remaining, which he yields to the gentleman from Mississippi, as the Chair supposes he has a right to do.

Mr. MORGAN. In order to give the gentleman from Mississippi an opportunity to go on to-morrow I move that the committee rise.

Mr. RANDALL. I trust not. I hope the gentleman from Mississippi will finish his remarks to-day, because to-morrow I want to talk about the bill.

Mr. HOAR. The Committee of the Whole have yielded to every request of this kind from gentlemen on the other side. It is now nearly five o'clock. On several days the committee, upon request of gentlemen on the other side, have risen a little after four o'clock. It would be rather hard to apply to the gentleman from Mississippi a different rule.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Mississippi knows quite well, and so does the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] that I am incapable of applying to the gentleman from Mississippi a different rule from what I would apply to anybody else.

Mr. HOAR. That is the reason I made the suggestion.

Mr. RANDALL. My wish to have the gentleman proceed now arose entirely from my anxiety to get this bill out of the way. I think the general debate has gone on sufficiently far—much beyond the usual practice. I only suggested that the gentleman from Mississippi should occupy his fifteen minutes now.

Mr. HOAR. I was sure that the courtesy of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] would yield at once to the suggestion when it was explained.

Mr. BLAINE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question. I have desired to occupy the floor, not directly upon this bill, but, if permitted to speak, I would keep as near to it as the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] or my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.] [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. I only followed in the beaten track.

Mr. BLAINE. I would probably have the opportunity to speak through the kindness of one of my colleagues who has entered a motion to reconsider a resolution to which my remarks would more pertinently apply; but I would like very much to have an hour to-morrow upon this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand that the gentleman wants to speak on the financial aspect of this bill.

Mr. BLAINE. My remarks will have a very close relationship to that.

Mr. RANDALL. I will say to the gentleman that so far as I am able I will facilitate him, although I do not want this evening to make any absolute promise. One thing is certain: Either I will facilitate his purpose before the general debate on this bill closes or I will join in securing him a hearing before we adjourn to-morrow.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not desire to interfere with the regular routine of business which the gentleman has charge of.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to "heap coals of fire" on the gentleman's head. I have repeatedly yielded to him; and I did so in a former debate when subsequently I was cut off by him. But "bygones are bygones."

Mr. BLAINE. Well, I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that through the courtesy of my colleague I have entire power to get possession of the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman need not apply to his colleague, because he will find in me a very cheerful agent in accomplishing his purpose. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. I was only giving a reason why I do not want the gentleman to "heap the coals" too hot. [Laughter.] If it does not interfere with the course of the debate, I would like very much to have the floor for an hour to-morrow.

Mr. RANDALL. I will consent that at the end of the fifteen minutes of the gentleman from Mississippi the gentleman from Maine shall have one hour. Then I want to discuss the bill somewhat, and after that proceed with the five-minute debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will understand this arrangement as binding in Committee of the Whole, unless objection be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I will follow the gentleman from Mississippi.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say that on going into the Committee of the Whole to-morrow the gentleman from Mississippi will not have the floor in his own right; he will be entitled only to the fifteen minutes yielded to him by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. BLAINE. Then, I understand, I am to follow?

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] will be recognized.

Mr. LYNCH. I desire to speak on this bill, but I certainly cannot express my views in fifteen minutes, and, unless by the courtesy of the committee I can have more time, I do not wish to occupy the floor at all.

Mr. RANDALL. I cannot hear what the gentleman from Mississippi says.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi says that the fifteen minutes to which he is entitled by courtesy of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be of no use to him in completing the speech which he intends to make, and therefore asks that his time be extended.

Mr. RANDALL. I have a right to be recognized by the Chair immediately upon the finishing of the hour of my colleague from Pennsylvania if he himself had occupied the whole of that hour, and, as he yielded what remained of his hour to the gentleman from Mississippi, I will of course be entitled to the floor at the conclusion of that time.

The CHAIRMAN. So the Chair understands.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Mississippi obtained his right to the floor through the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I insist upon claiming my right at the end of my colleague's hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. The committee or the House can extend the time of the gentleman from Mississippi as it pleases.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move that the time of the gentleman from Mississippi be extended thirty minutes, which I understand is what he desires.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not submit that resolution to the committee until the time arrives. If the committee rise now, the gentleman from Mississippi will be entitled to the floor to-morrow, and either in the House or after we go into committee the question can be submitted as to whether his time shall be extended or not.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not care how much time in reason is extended to the gentleman from Mississippi, but I want the closing hour for myself.

Mr. HOLMAN. I take it for granted there will be no objection to the extension of time, but to-morrow will be more appropriate to submit the request. I hope the committee will now rise.

Mr. LYNCH. I will yield to a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOSKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (S. No. 53) fixing the time of holding the circuit court of the United States in the districts of California, Oregon, and Nevada; when the Speaker signed the same.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 58) to pay the First National Bank of Saint Albans, in the county of Franklin, and State of Vermont, the value of certain United States Treasury notes held by said bank as financial agent of the United States, and forcibly taken therefrom by raiders from Canada, in October, 1864;

An act (S. No. 417) for continuing the work of improving the Capitol grounds; and Joint resolution (S. Res. No. 4) authorizing Captain Temple and Lieutenant-Commander Whiting, of the Navy, to accept a decoration from the King of the Hawaiian Islands.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 417) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls to the Ladies' Monumental Association of Allegheny County for monumental purposes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. ODELL for four days on account of urgent business, and to Mr. WOODWORTH indefinitely on account of a death in his family.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. TUCKER, by unanimous consent, leave was was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of William Graham, now in possession of the Committee on Patents.

SAINT ALBANS NATIONAL BANK.

On motion of Mr. HENDEE, by unanimous consent, a bill (S. No. 58) to pay the first national bank of Saint Albans, in the county of Franklin, and State of Vermont, the value of certain United States Treasury notes held by said bank as financial agent of the United States and forcibly taken therefrom by raiders from Canada in October, 1864, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. CROUNSE, (at five o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 10, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

DISTRICT 3.65 BONDS.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury, subject to the requisition of said commissioners, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. WHYTE, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives to the said joint resolution, and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

Messrs. MORRILL of Maine, SARGENT, and THURMAN were appointed the conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (H. R. No. 356) concerning cases in bankruptcy commenced in the supreme courts of the several Territories prior to the 22d of June, 1874, and now undetermined therein;

A bill (H. R. No. 390) to repeal the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, and all laws and parts of laws amendatory thereof;

A bill (H. R. No. 555) to amend section 856 of the Revised Statutes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1210) authorizing actions in cases of death resulting from wrongful act, neglect, or default.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SARGENT. I present sundry petitions signed by residents of the State of California, praying Congress to make an appropriation in aid of the centennial fund. As that proposition is now before the Senate, I move that these petitions lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN presented a telegram in the nature of a petition, signed by leading merchants of Chicago, Illinois, praying a repeal of the bankrupt law, to take effect at a date not later than the 1st of July, 1876; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WALLACE presented three petitions of 500 citizens of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, artisans and workers in iron and coal, praying Congress to guarantee the interest on the bonds issued by the Texas and Pacific Railroad Company and in aid of the prostrated iron industries of Pennsylvania, which were referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. HAMLIN presented a letter of the Postmaster-General addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, regarding the general subjects of classification and expenses connected with the transportation of mail-matter; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present the memorial of the Washington Monument Society, praying Congress to make an appropriation to aid in the completion of the Washington Monument. As this subject has been sent to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, I move that this memorial take that direction.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARVEY presented a petition of residents upon the Kansas Indian trust lands, praying a reduction of the price of said lands; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. KERNAN presented a petition of citizens of the city of New York, praying for the repeal of the general bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement showing the aggregate number of the organized militia of the several States, respectively, according to the latest returns received at the office of the Adjutant-General of the Army; which, on motion of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 25) granting the right of way to the Leavenworth Street Railroad Company across the Fort Leavenworth military reservation, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. McDONALD, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 326) for the relief of the widow of L. H. Rousseau, deceased, late brigadier-general and brevet major-general of the United States Army, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. HOWE, from the Joint Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the memorial of Admiral Charles Wilkes, asking an investigation as to the reasons for stopping the publication of the results of the exploring expedition and for refusing payments therefor, submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 206) granting a pension to Catharine Ferry, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Emanuel Slifer on behalf of James Eli Butts and Malinda Frances Butts, minor heirs of Joseph Butts, deceased, late a private in the Seventh Regiment of Maryland Volunteers, praying that an act may be passed granting a pension to the said heirs, submitted a report thereon accompanied by a bill (S. No. 425) granting a pension to James Eli Butts and Malinda Frances Butts.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Eunice Tripler, widow of the late Dr. Charles S. Tripler, surgeon United States Army, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of James S. Collins, of Hancock County, Maine, praying to be granted a pension on account of services rendered the United States in the war of 1812, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. CRAGIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of William Gibson, a commander in the Navy on the retired list, praying to be restored to the active list of the Navy, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of William C. West, a commander on the retired list of the Navy, praying to be allowed the sea pay of a lieutenant-commander on the active list, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

SERVICE OF WRITS OF MANDAMUS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 13) to amend the fourteenth section of the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved September 24, 1789, to report it with amendments; and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that whenever the circuit courts of the United States shall, in the exercise of their jurisdiction, issue writs of mandamus or other common-law writs, and the party or persons to whom the writs shall be directed shall for any cause neglect or fail to perform the act or duty required thereby, the court from which the writ issues may, upon the application of the plaintiff in whose favor the writ is issued, besides or instead of proceeding against the defendant by attachment, direct that the act required to be done shall be done by some person appointed by the court, at the expense of the defendant, to be recovered by the same process, by and along with the cost of the writ or writs; and when such courts shall have rendered judgment against any municipal corporation for the recovery of any sum of money, and it is necessary to levy and collect a tax for the payment thereof, the courts shall have power, through the proper officers of such corporation or through the persons appointed as aforesaid, to levy and collect such a tax as may be necessary to pay such judgment, together with the costs of such procedure.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment of the committee was in line 9 to strike out the words "plaintiff in whose favor" and insert "person for whose benefit;" so as to read:

Upon the application of the person for whose benefit the writ is issued, &c.

Mr. KERNAN. I desire to get a little more information upon this matter, and I ask the Senator who reported it if this is a bill which proposes to remedy a difficulty of this kind: For instance, a judgment is obtained against a town or city in the circuit court, against the officers of that municipality to assess a tax. Is the object of this bill to have the court appoint officers who shall assess that tax upon the taxpayers of the municipality? I wish the Senator to explain that.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is one object of the bill. The bill has two objects. When a writ of mandamus is issued to enforce a judgment of the Federal courts, it has been quite customary for the officer to whom the writ was directed to resign, thereby defeating the enforcement of the judgment. In that event the bill authorizes the court to appoint another officer to perform that duty. Also, if any municipal corporation or county fails to levy the proper tax for the payment of the judgment, the court is authorized by a mandamus to direct the officers of that county to levy it or appoint some one to do it. This bill passed both the Senate and House at the last session, but failed of final action for want of concurrence in all respects.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the first amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in line 15, after the word "corporation," to insert "or county, or any officer or officers of such corporation or county;" so as to read:

And when such courts shall have rendered judgment against any municipal corporation or county, or any officer or officers of such corporation or county, for the recovery of any sum of money, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "corporation," in line 19, to insert the words "or county;" so as to read:

Through the proper officers of such corporation or county, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. COCKRELL. I would like to have the bill read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be reported.

The bill was read as amended.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, what committee reported this bill to the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on the Judiciary. It was reported by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN.]

Mr. MERRIMON. It is a very important bill; one in which my constituents are interested, and I think the constituents of many other Senators are deeply interested in it. Therefore I trust it will not be pressed upon the attention of the Senate at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has already agreed to its consideration; the amendments of the committee have been reported and concurred in, and the bill is now open to further amendment.

Mr. MERRIMON. I trust the Senator who called it up will agree to let it lie over for the present.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think that this bill ought to pass. It was unanimously reported from the Committee on the Judiciary at the last session; has been so reported again. It passed the Senate at the last session; it passed the House of Representatives at the last session. The whole object of the bill is to give efficacy to the judgments of the Federal courts. Without this bill it is in the power of the debtor to defeat the judgment. I hope that the Senate will pass the bill.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am very sure that this is a bill which ought not to pass without debate and due consideration by the Senate. I have very great respect for the judgment of the Judiciary Committee; I have great confidence in their judgment; but I believe from my experience as a practicing lawyer and my observation that it is unwise to pass this bill, if indeed Congress has the power to pass such a bill. It had its origin in cases of this sort: In some of the counties in the States of the Northwest, where they have issued county bonds, the authorities have failed to lay taxes to pay the interest upon such bonds, and creditors holding coupons have brought suits in the Federal courts, and the officers of the Federal courts have been unable to collect their debts. The purpose of this act is to authorize the circuit courts of the United States, instead of proceeding under the writ of mandamus, to direct a particular officer, a marshal for example, to go and lay the tax and collect it in the several counties. The Supreme Court have decided that as the law now stands there is no such authority in the courts. I confess as a lawyer I at one time thought they had such power, but the Supreme Court have decided that they had not.

I am not prepared to debate the matter now. I wish to look into it with great care. It is a subject very interesting to my people at this time, and it is interesting to the people in other sections of the Union. I therefore trust it will not be pressed upon the attention of the Senate this morning.

Mr. McDONALD. I concur with the Senator from North Carolina in reference to the character of this bill. I shall certainly not be willing to vote for it at this time, if at all. It seems to vest a very great power in the Federal courts in reference to collecting local taxes in certain cases. I would desire with him that the bill should pass over for the present until it can be more carefully examined.

Mr. WITHERS. I unite in the request on the part of the Virginia people who are especially interested in this matter. Some of the counties have a deep interest in it, and I hope it may be thoroughly investigated before it is pushed to a vote.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There was a remark dropped by one of the Senators that there was a question of constitutional power to pass such an act. That question has been settled by the Supreme Court. The State of Iowa has a State statute similar to this authorizing the court to appoint officers in case of the resignation of officers to whom a mandamus is directed, and also authorizing the court to direct a levy to be made.

Mr. MERRIMON. May I interrupt my friend.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In one moment. The Supreme Court of the United States has held that the Federal courts following the practice of the State in Iowa could so execute the writ of mandamus, which is a direct adjudication as to the constitutionality of this act; and to hold that it is unconstitutional is to hold that the judgments of the Federal courts are inoperative.

If, however, Senators wish the opportunity to look further into this bill, I will let it pass over, trusting that they will give me their support to bring it up on another occasion.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to say this, sir, in reply to what has just fallen from the Senator from New Jersey, that the Supreme Court have expressly held, in a case of recent date, that the circuit courts of the United States have no power to send a marshal into a county to collect a debt, even where the county authorities had laid the tax and where the sheriff had failed to collect it and where he resigned rather than collect it. The Supreme Court have held that the circuit courts have no power to send a marshal there to collect the tax in that case, and this bill is intended to effectuate a remedy for that supposed evil in part.

I know that there are claimants throughout the country who have a deep interest in this bill; and it may be possible that we have the power to pass it. I will not undertake to say how that is, but I do say that I shall desire to be heard upon it, and I have no doubt others will. At all events I want to examine it, and I trust that we shall have a fair opportunity to do that.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There is no doubt of the correctness of the statemont of the Senator. If there was no evil to cure, if the Supreme Court had the power when one officer resigned to appoint another in his place, this bill would not have been introduced. It is to cure that very evil; but the Supreme Court has expressly decided that this act is constitutional. I hope that the Senators who wish to debate it will aid me in the future in bringing it up.

Mr. RANSOM. I desire to say to my friend from New Jersey that I am very much obliged to him for letting the bill go over this morning. I shall desire to be heard on it when it does come up, and I think I shall be able to give some reasons to my friend which will satisfy him, or at least tend to satisfy him, that he ought not to press this bill at this juncture or during this session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By common consent the bill goes over.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WINDOM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 426) for the relief of Elias D. Bruner; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 427) establishing the port of La Crosse, Wisconsin, as a port of appraisal; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAPERTON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 428) to aid the Washington and Ohio Railroad Company in the construction of their road to the Ohio River; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRIMON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 429) to authorize the Eastern Band of Cherokee Indians to institute suits against the Cherokee Indians residing west of the Mississippi River, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 430) to incorporate the National Bond and Mortgage Company of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. MERRIMON, it was Ordered, That Sarah Shelton and Sarah J. Greene have leave to withdraw their papers from the files of the Senate, leaving copies of the same.

C. H. FREDERICK.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask the Senate to take up the bill for the relief of C. H. Frederick, reported by the Committee on Military Affairs a few days ago. It will take but a moment.

The bill (S. No. 416) for the relief of C. H. Frederick, late a lieutenant-colonel in the Ninth Missouri Infantry, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates $388.24, being amount due C. H. Frederick from date of enlistment to date of muster.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 14, which was under consideration at the time the morning hour expired yesterday.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 14) to extend the time for the construction and completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad, the pending question being on the amendment of the Committee on Railroads to make the bill read:

That ten years' additional time is hereby granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to construct and complete its road under its charter and the resolutions of Congress relating thereto; and the proviso to section 1 of the act of July 15, 1870, entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1871, and for other purposes," which requires the payment of the costs of surveys by said company, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. That this extension is granted upon the express condition and understanding that where pre-emption and homestead claims were initiated or private entries and locations were allowed upon lands embraced in the grant to said company prior to the receipt of the orders of withdrawal at the respective district land offices, the same may be perfected and carried into patent, and the company shall be entitled to indemnity therefor as now provided by law: Provided, That this condition shall not apply to lands heretofore patented to the company nor to entries already canceled and upon which the purchase-money or other consideration has been returned to the respective parties in interest.

SEC. 3. That entries remaining unadjusted and suspended in the General Land Office on account of an increase in price of the even sections within the limits of the grant, where the same were made or based upon settlement made prior to the receipt of the respective orders of withdrawal aforesaid, shall be relieved from such suspension and carried into patent; but nothing in this act shall be construed to affect existing adjustments nor to authorize the refunding of any moneys received for such lands under existing laws.

SEC. 4. That the extension of time granted by section 1 of this act shall not apply to the branch line of said road from Lake Prend d'Oreille, across the Cascade Mountains, to Puget Sound, in Washington Territory; but all acts and parts of acts, so far as they make any grant of lands or other aid for the construction of said branch, are hereby repealed; and the lands heretofore granted therefor shall be, and they are hereby, restored to the public domain, to be dealt with as other public lands, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 5. That the said Northern Pacific Railroad Company shall file with the Secretary of the Interior, within six months from the date hereof, its assent to, and acceptance of, the provisions of this act, or be forever debarred from taking or receiving any benefit from or under the same.

Mr. SARGENT. Yesterday I gave notice of an amendment that I would offer to this bill. If it is in order, I desire now to propose that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment reported from the Committee on Railroads is first in order. The Senator from California can move to amend that amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out in the second section, lines 6 and 7, the words, "The same may be perfected and carried into patent and;" and in lieu thereof to insert:

The land embraced in such entries shall not be held as within the grant to said company and shall be patented to the parties lawfully entering the same, and in case of abandonment by them shall be open to pre-emption and homestead entry only of actual settlers, but—

The CHIEF CLERK. If the section be thus amended it will read:

That this extension is granted upon the express condition and understanding that where pre-emption and homestead claims were initiated, or private entries and locations were allowed, upon lands embraced in the grant to said company prior to the receipt of the orders of withdrawal at the respective district land offices, the land embraced in such entries shall not be held as within the grant to said company, and shall be patented to the parties lawfully entering the same, and in case of abandonment by them shall be open to pre-emption and homestead entry only by actual settlers; but the company shall be entitled to indemnity therefor as now provided by law.

Mr. SARGENT. I will modify the amendment by saying "lawfully entered under the provisions of this section," because the theory of the section is to overrule certain decisions which were made by the Land Office, and in consonance with a bill we passed the other day, and I do not wish to revert to the condition of things when those decisions were in force. I modify the amendment as I have stated. The modification is to insert after the word "entered" the words "under the provisions of this section."

This amendment, I suppose, will need no further explanation than that which I made of it yesterday. The bill, as drawn by the committee, probably had the same intent. That I am willing to assume; and it provides that where pre-emption and homestead claims were initiated, or private entries, &c., made, these may be carried to patents. But suppose the parties die, or suppose they have left or sold? These lands were originally reserved, the lands themselves were reserved by the original grant; but by a failure of remedy they passed to the railroad company, as they have done in my own State under similar grants, and in other States, to the great distress and oppression of persons who supposed they had a right to acquire the lands of the original pre-emption or homestead settler; because by such acquisition they were not carried back to a time antecedent to the railroad grant. Now, I come in and simply say that the land itself shall not pass—not merely that the inchoate title shall some time be perfected, as it may never be, and is still less likely to be when these extensions are made; but the land itself is reserved and shall not pass to the railroad company, but shall be open to pre-emption and homestead settlement only to actual settlers.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask the Senator from California if it has been the ruling of the Land Department that in all cases where there was an actual settler on an odd section at the time the grant was made the land did not pass by virtue of the act to the railroad company?

Mr. SARGENT. I know that in some of their decisions they have looked that way, but the practical effect of the decision is lost because there is no party to contest the right of the railroad company to receive the land. The Land Office does not recognize any pre-emption or homstead settler whose right did not accrue before the grant, and there is, consequently, a failure of parties, there is nobody to show that these rights did accrue (the rights which were formerly held and to which I refer by this amendment) before the railroad grant. They do not recognize the right of contest in any parties that come in afterward; they recognize no deraignment except from the original party, and no possession that does not antedate the grant. But if that is the decision of the Land Office, and this is in consonance with it, it is another reason, perhaps, why objection ought not to be raised to the amendment I have proposed.

Mr. MITCHELL. I agree precisely with the Senator from California as to what the law ought to be. But the only point is whether this is necessary.

Mr. SARGENT. My own experience, as I stated yesterday, is that it is necessary. I know that along the line of the Central Pacific Railroad in California men who went there years before the grant was made supposed they had a right to sell the improvements which they had made upon their lands, and that the party who purchased had a right to buy, and the party who purchased supposed he had that right; but the railroad grant intervening between the original possession and the purchase, those who had paid for improvements which were worth thousands of dollars lost their money, lost any improvements which they put upon the land, lost possession of the land, and it went to the railroad company simply because the land office could not under our general laws recognize anybody to show a pre-emption which had been abandoned and which would have prevented this result. Knowing these things to be so in my own State, I reason that they may occur elsewhere. In fact, the complaint is not confined to my State. Settlers generally, as I understand, complain of these hardships and difficulties. As the law now stands, it is a trap for the unwary. While the wise maxim of the law in reference to criminal matters is that every man is presumed to know it and acts at his peril in disregarding it, it is a harsh maxim where it is applied to remedial statutes, and certainly it is harsh where private rights are concerned under laws like this. You cannot assume that the hardy pioneer who goes out into the wilderness, cuts down the trees, makes a clearing, makes his home there, understands the nice distinctions which we draw, or in fact the wording of the statutes or the statutes at all. It is to protect this class in the exercise of what seems to them a natural right that except for a prohibition in the statute would be perfectly right, and is morally right in any aspect, to prevent their being entrapped, and to allow them to have the benefit of the act. Therefore I propose this amendment. I would like to look at my modification, however, and see that it is correct.

Mr. KELLY. I shall make no objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California. I see no objection to it myself. It is in the interest of the settler, and so far I am willing to accept it.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I propose the following amendment, to come in before section 5, which I believe is now the last section of the bill:

This act shall not be construed to affect existing private rights otherwise than as hereinbefore expressly provided, and shall, as well as said charter and other acts and resolutions hereinbefore mentioned, be subject to alteration, amendment, or repeal at the pleasure of Congress.

The object of the first branch of the amendment is not to allow the privilege which we grant to this company of extension to disturb any existing private rights of the settlers or others in these lands; and lest the amendment that has already been provided shall not effectuate that purpose and cover all the cases that may exist, I think it right that we should not let the bill go without the additional provision that I have made, which is consistent as I have drawn it with what has already been provided.

The second branch of the amendment I suppose every one will agree to. It is that this present legislation in aid of this company, like all the former legislation, shall be subject to the future judgment and discretion of Congress, to do as Congress, standing indifferent between the people and the company, shall think wise and necessary for the good of either party. I hope we shall never hereafter pass a bill relating to a corporation in which we shall not reserve the right to change and repeal according to the public interests.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment reported by the Committee on Railroads.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to strike out the proviso in section 2 contained in lines 8 to 12 inclusive.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proviso proposed to be striken out is in the following words:

Provided, That this condition shall not apply to lands heretofore patented to the company, nor to entries already canceled and upon which the purchase-money or other consideration has been returned to the respective parties in interest.

Mr. INGALLS. The ostensible purpose of this section is to establish and define the relative rights of settlers and the railroad company within the limits of the land grant. It practically adopts the provisions of the bill passed by the Senate a few days ago upon the same subject. But the proviso is ingeniously contrived to deprive the only class of persons who could be benefited by the section itself from all advantages that could be derived under it.

Provided, That this condition shall not apply to lands heretofore patented to the company, nor to entries already canceled and upon which the purchase-money or other consideration has been returned to the respective parties in interest.

The object of the prior portion of the section is to declare that the land grant shall not attach until notice of the withdrawal has been received at the local land offices in the various districts through which the road may run. It is a matter of entire indifference to the railroad company when the period of definite location is fixed. In all the acts incorporating the subsidized railroads it is expressly declared that if at the time when the land is withdrawn adverse homestead and pre-emption claims have attached the companies shall have what is known as the right of indemnity selections within limits named in the bill. Therefore it is immaterial to them when the period is fixed. They lose nothing in either event. But under the conflicting rulings of the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior heretofore many of these entries have been canceled in the interests of the railroads and against the rights of those who had initiated legal and valid homestead and pre-emption rights to these and to other railroad lands. This proviso is therefore a direct assault upon the interests of the only persons who could be benefited by the provisions of the section without the proviso. I trust therefore that the friends of the bill will consent that this obnoxious addition may be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I shall vote against this bill which extends the time of the present Northern Pacific Railroad Company to complete this road. It is known that there were some fifteen millions of acres of the public land donated to the company for the purpose of aiding in the construction of its road. I myself saw an advertisement of the company at the time they issued their bonds stating that the amount of the public land which had been donated them, at the price of $2.50 per acre, would be sufficient to build the entire road and equip it, and leave a clear profit of $25,000,000 to the corporators. That was the advertisement which they put before the world when they were anxious to sell the bonds of the company. Bonds of the company were issued. Men anxious to secure a large gold interest upon their investments saw proper to invest some of their surplus capital in those bonds. The company became bankrupt, and the franchises and rights and privileges of the company have since been sold, and have passed now into the hands of the purchasers of the bonds. Many of the men who hold the bonds of the company procured them at nominal prices, and this proposition is to extend the benefits of that land grant to the present holders of the bonds of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. For one I cannot vote to do it. I believe the grant originally was wrong and improper, and it is especially so now because the benefit of all that land grant is to be passed to the holders of those bonds, who are virtually now the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, when it is known that many of those bonds were bought up at very nominal prices. If the company completes the road, complies with its contract, as a matter of course it will be entitled to the land; but this proposition is to extend the time, to aid the present holders of the bonds of the company to complete the road in the next ten years and take all the advantages and benefits of the land grant. To that I am opposed. I have no objection to the building of the Northern Pacific Railroad, or the Southern Pacific Railroad, or any other Pacific railroad, but I am opposed to doing it out of the public Treasury, or out of donations of the public lands.

There are already four or five hundred miles of this road constructed, and I apprehend that the present company, who are the bondholders of the old company, have now in their franchises and in the road of that company a quid pro quo for all their bonds have cost them. It may be that there were some of the original purchasers of the bonds who paid their money, perhaps the par value, but they did it as an investment, and they must stand by that investment and take whatever losses may occur by it, as they would have taken whatever profits would have inured from it.

I shall not by my vote extend the benefits of this land grant to the present company. Believing the land grant to have been originally wrong, I think it is still more wrong to give the benefits of the grant to gentlemen who have invested their capital in buying up bonds at a nominal price. For that reason I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. President, if we are to distinguish among persons who should be encouraged, surely the preference should be for those who have invested their money in good faith for the purpose of constructing this road. I do not propose to take up the time of the Senate, because I see that the morning hour is fast approaching its close. I will simply say that these bondholders have invested of their money $30,000,000, and they ask an extension of time so that they may complete this road which now runs from Bismarck across to the Missouri River. If the time be extended, they propose to commence the building of it beyond that point during the summer. It seems to me that the northern section of the United States and the Northwest is entitled to something in the way of Government aid in building a road to it. To show the interest that the people of that section have in it, I will state that I received a telegram yesterday to the effect that the Montana Legislative Council had voted three and a half millions of dollars to aid in the construction of it. This shows how all-important it is to them, and if they open it up as far as Montana it will become from that day a paying road, and it will pour in population to the great Northwest and open it, which cannot be done for many a day if this grant be not extended.

I will say further that this company does not come here to ask any money aid from Congress. They do not propose to ask that a single dollar be paid out of the Treasury. It is only that the aid in land already given shall be extended for eight years longer. Let me say that there is no more equitable or just way of constructing a road than the grant of lands along the route. The Government loses nothing; it doubles the price of the even sections that are to be sold to settlers, and in that way realizes as much money as if all the land were sold at a dollar and a quarter an acre. Who would not give half the land he possessed in an out-of-the-way country for the purpose of constructing a road to enable him to get his products to the markets of the world? It benefits the settlers; it is no loss to the Government; and, as no money aid is asked, I think the least that can be done for this section of the country is to extend this grant for a few years longer.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand that an amendment was made on motion of the Senator from Kansas striking out a certain proviso in the second section. I wish that amendment reserved.

Mr. INGALLS. That amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. I should like to ask the committee who reported the amendments the object of that provision in the second section, and why, after the deliberations of the committee on this subject, it should have been stricken out in Committee of the Whole without debate. The section is an extension of eight years of the original grant, with this proviso:

That where pre-emption and homestead claims were initiated, or private entries and locations were allowed, upon lands embraced in the grant to said company, prior to the receipt of the orders of withdrawal at the respective district land offices, the same may be perfected and carried into patent, and the company shall be entitled to indemnity therefor, as now provided by law: Provided, That this condition shall not apply to lands heretofore patented to the company, nor to entries already canceled and upon which the purchase money or other consideration has been returned to the respective parties in interest.

I ask, why should not such a proviso as that be retained in the bill? It must have found its way there as the result of the deliberations of the committee, and it seems to me, with all due respect to the Senator who moved the amendment, that it has been stricken out from the bill improperly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You will have to move to restore it then. It is not pending now.

Mr. INGALLS. In response to the Senator from Delaware——

Mr. BAYARD. I do not wish to interfere with the bill. I am opposed to it; but I would move to restore that proviso.

Mr. INGALLS. The second section was intended to embody and adopt the provisions of the bill that passed the Senate a few days ago, No. 34 I think, on the subject of the respective claims of homestead and pre-emption settlers and railroad companies within the limits of railroad grants. If the Senator from Delaware will scrutinize the section he will observe that, although the principle contended for is embodied in the main portion of the section, yet the proviso is so ingeniously devised that it deprives the only persons who could receive any benefit from it of all advantages that can be received under it. As I have previously said it is immaterial to the railroad company when the period of withdrawal is fixed, whether at the time the act is approved, when the survey is made, when the map of withdrawal is filed with the Secretary of the Interior, or when the land is withdrawn from market at the local land office. In either event the railroad company is entitled to indemnity selections within the limits of the land grant. But, though it is immaterial to the railroad company when that period is fixed, it is a question of very great moment to the settlers upon the lands from this fact: that for the past three or four years adverse and conflicting decisions of the Interior Department have deprived a large number of them of their rights as against the railroad companies. In other words, the previous equitable construction now incorporated in the section 2, recognizing the rights of settlers up to the time when notice of withdrawal was filed in the local land office, has been changed to a period in many cases long anterior, whereby large numbers of homestead and pre-emption settlers have been deprived of their homes. Therefore this proviso, while it was intended, I dare say, in good faith to carry out and further the designs of the bill, is really an entire defeat of the beneficent purposes of the section, applying as it does to the only class of individuals who can derive no benefit from it. Therefore it ought to go out.

Mr. BAYARD. Cannot an amendment to exclude the conclusion the Senator speaks of be made so as not to conflict with the effect of the bill which the Senate passed a few days ago in favor of the rights of actual settlers?

Mr. INGALLS. As I said, it is entirely immaterial to the railroad company; it is a matter of absolute indifference to them when the period of withdrawal is fixed or when their grant becomes operative, because, whenever that period may be, whenever it is declared that their rights attach to the land, the statute under which they are incorporated says that if there are adverse homestead or pre-emption rights they shall be entitled to indemnity selections outside of their limits. It is in the interest of the settler, both homestead and pre-emption, and not against the interest of the railroad company.

Mr. BAYARD. Then the proviso is inconsistent with the section?

Mr. INGALLS. Absolutely.

Mr. BAYARD. Then how came the committee to report it?

Mr. INGALLS. It is my impression that the second section was in the nature of a tub thrown to the whale. I distrust these railroad corporations even when they come bearing gifts. I am not sure that the proviso was not deliberately intended to keep the word of promise to the ear and break it to the hope; that the purpose of its insertion was to appear to concede the rightfulness of the principle that has been discussed here in the Senate and at the same time to deprive those persons who would derive benefit under it from the advantages that it was intended to confer upon them.

Mr. MITCHELL. I understand the Senator from Kansas to say in the most positive manner that the effect of this proviso to this section is to do away entirely with the former part of the section.

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now I ask him does the proviso cut off the rights of a settler who settled on the public lands prior to the time that notice of the filing of the map was delivered to the local land office and whose application has not been canceled by the Department and in a case where a patent has not been issued? Then I ask further if there is not a large class of persons who come within that description?

Mr. KELLY. I think I can explain the matter to the entire satisfaction of the Senator from Kansas. The ruling of the Land Office was originally that the company was not entitled to any land until it was actually withdrawn in the local land offices. It seems that this company filed its map of the general route on the 13th day of August, 1870.

Mr. INGALLS. When were the lands withdrawn?

Mr. KELLY. The lands were withdrawn on February 10, 1872.

Mr. INGALLS. Nearly two years after.

Mr. KELLY. Eighteen months afterward. Between those dates there were certain persons who settled on the lands, and there were certain entries by persons where the lands had been offered for sale. As I said, the ruling of the Land Office was that they had a right to settle prior to February 10, 1872. On March 15, 1873, the Interior Department reversed that ruling, which of course was in the interest of the company. Meanwhile there were a great many settlers upon the lands. Some of those settlers remain there to this day. Others, on account of the ruling of the Secretary of the Interior, abandoned those locations; others who had paid money received it back from the receiver of the land office; and this proviso simply applies to that class of persons, those who have taken back their money and surrendered their rights, or to homestead claimants who, after the decision of the Secretary of the Interior, went off the land and took other lands in lieu.

Mr. BAYARD. Does not this proviso protect that class?

Mr. KELLY. This proviso is intended for them; that where the enterers took back their money the lands shall go to the company, or where the homestead or pre-emption claimants surrendered their rights and the lands have been patented to the railroad company, in that case the former part of the section shall not apply.

Mr. INGALLS. If that is the purpose of this proviso it is entirely superfluous, because the Senator himself must be aware, as every other member of this body is, that an abandoned pre-emption right does not change the right of the railroad company.

Mr. KELLY. That is the very reason why I said nothing at the time, because it is a matter of perfect indifference to me whether it is stricken out or not. I only desired to show that it was inserted by the committee in good faith, because they believe that where a man had received back his money for a tract of land he ought not to claim any right to that land.

Mr. HARVEY. I hope the friends of this bill will not insist upon resisting the amendment made on the motion of my colleague. It must be seen that this proviso can be construed, by implication at least, as a confirmation of the unwarranted rulings of the Department of the Interior, concerning which so much discussion was had a few days ago during the consideration of Senate bill No. 34. I say it must be evident that the passage of the bill with this proviso could be so construed; and as the action of the Senate was so decided in condemnation of that ruling, it must be evident that the bill with this proviso in it would meet a very strong opposition in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, to re-insert the proviso stricken out of the second section.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 35, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Boutwell, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton, Clayton, Conkling, Cragin, Dawes, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, Key, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Randolph, Sargent, Wallace, West, and Windom—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Booth, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Goldthwaite, Harvey, Johnston, McCreery, McDonald, Merrimon, Norwood, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, Whyte, and Withers—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Bogy, Bruce, Burnside, Christiancy, Conover, Eaton, English, Gordon, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Jones of Nevada, Maxey, Ransom, Robertson, Sherman, Spencer, and Wright—19.

So the bill was passed.

LIZZIE DICKSON.

Mr. WEST. I failed to notice yesterday, Mr. President, that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAPERTON] reported from the Committee on Claims adversely upon a bill for the relief of a Miss Dickson and the bill was postponed indefinitely. Had I been here, I should have asked that the bill be placed on the Calendar without action. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. No. 246) for the relief of Miss Lizzie Dickson was indefinitely postponed, and ask that it be placed on the Calendar merely for the purpose of preventing the parties being concluded against positively at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana moves to reconsider the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 514) relating to the centennial celebration of American Independence.

Mr. NORWOOD. Mr. President, we read in an eastern story of an orphan princess who, hearing and believing that in a distant land and on the summit of a lofty mountain there were precious treasures, commissioned a brother to make the journey in order to obtain them for her. He went, and arriving at the base of the mountain, met an aged man who told him that in ascending he would hear threats of violence, and should he heed them and look back he would turn to stone and fall on the mountain-side. He began to ascend, and hearing the predicted threats, he became alarmed, looked back, and turned to stone. Another brother made the attempt, and not heeding the counsel given, he met the same fate. The princess then undertook the perilous journey, and when told of the dangers, she stopped her ears, fixed her eyes on the summit turned neither to the right nor the left, ascended to the top, and secured the treasures.

Five years ago the State of Georgia, queenly even in her desolation, believing that in the future upon the lofty plain of constitutional justice and equality were the treasures of peace and prosperity in reserve for her, commissioned one of her humblest sons to assist in the endeavor to secure those blessings for her. He came, and before entering upon the labor assigned to him he was told of the taunts and sneers and jeers he would hear around him; but at the outset he resolved that, fixing his eye upon the blessings which his mother so much needed and desired, he would neither look to the right nor to the left, but press onward and upward in the endeavor to secure them. How far that resolution has been kept he leaves to the judgment of his brother Senators, republicans and democrats, and to the records of this Senate. He has discussed party politics freely and boldly, but has never uttered a word in this Chamber that was sectional in its character or calculated to wound the honor or the pride of any man from any section of this Union.

But why this reference, it may be asked. Because, sir, since the discussion on this amnesty bill, in Congress, on the streets, in the press, it has been said that the vote of a southern man upon this question was to be regarded as a test of his patriotism. Sir, if to vote away millions of money upon a power which some of us believe to be unconstitutional, and which many of us believe to be at the best doubtful, and which others still believe to be inexpedient and unwise, be the test of patriotism, I am free to say that I do not love my country. These remarks, again, are suggested by the words which fell from the lips of a Senator in discussing this question on yesterday. He said, if I be not mistaken, that it was "indecent and mean" not to make this appropriation. As a matter of course, those who vote against the bill must be indecent and mean.

Mr. MORTON. With the Senator's permission——

Mr. NORWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I presume the Senator refers to the remark I made yesterday. I believe I used the word "decency," but I used it as I intended to, if I was not so understood, as to the attitude the nation would occupy if it should refuse to make an appropriation to pay the expenses of this Centennial after having invited the nations of the world to come here. I did not intend to reflect upon the motives of any Senator. I believe I have never done such a thing in the Senate. I think I applied the word "mean" perhaps to an amendment that had been offered to the bill requiring the United States first to be repaid in preference to the stockholders or those who had subscribed stock. I did not think well of that amendment; but I certainly had no purpose to reflect upon the motives of any Senator whatever. I merely intended to indicate what would be the position of the nation in my opinion if, after having invited the nations of the world to come here, it should refuse to contribute to the expenses of the Centennial.

Mr. NORWOOD. With great pleasure I accept the explanation of the Senator, and therefore shall omit what I intended to say on that subject. I know the words were used by him, and I thought, in application to those who oppose this bill. I hope, therefore, that this question of patriotism, of a man being patriotic or unpatriotic according to the views he may entertain on this question or the vote that he may cast, will no longer be heard in this Chamber or elsewhere.

Premising that much, I desire now to consider this question calmly, dispassionately, and in the light of law and of reason. The first thing to be considered is the character of the bill. This is a bill to appropriate the sum of $1,500,000 to complete the centennial buildings in the city of Philadelphia. By the act of June 1, 1872, the Centennial Commission is declared to be—

A body politic and corporate in law, with power to do such acts, and enter into such obligations, as may be promotive of the purposes for which such commission was established. Its title shall be the United States Centennial Commission. It shall have a common and corporate seal, and possess all the rights incident to corporate existence.

Who, then, is to be the beneficiary of this fund? It is the centennial board of finance, which is a private corporation.

I wish to divest this question of the idea that the people are interested in it. It is all a mistake. The people have no interest in a dollar of this million five hundred thousand dollars, except to keep it in the Treasury. It is to be used for the erection of buildings that belong to a private corporation. This fact is not questioned by any friend of this bill.

Then, second, what is the purpose of the fund? Why, sir, it is to be used in a private speculation. To make this clear, let us look at the act just referred to. Section 10 is as follows:

SEC. 10. That as soon as practicable after the said exhibition shall have been closed it shall be the duty of said corporation to convert its property into cash, and, after the payment of all its liabilities, to divide its remaining assets among its stockholders pro rata, in full satisfaction and discharge of its capital stock.

Thus we see that this appropriation is not only for a private corporation, but it is for the exclusive pecuniary benefit of the stockholders in that corporation. They can apply the fund as they see fit. If they erect buildings they will belong to that corporation, and the proceeds of sale, if the buildings should be sold, will go to the stockholders.

The delusion is cherished by many that this money is to be appropriated to celebrate the Declaration of Independence, while others know it is for the exhibition of the arts and manufactures. Whether it be for either, or whether it be for both, in my judgment, after mature consideration, the appropriation finds no warrant in the Constitution. Has Congress the power, and this is the naked question, divested of all garniture, to appropriate money to be used by a private corporation in a private speculation for its own benefit? That is the whole question, and I now come to a consideration of the constitutional view of it. It is not pretended by any friend of this measure that there is any direct grant of power in the Constitution authorizing this appropriation. There is not a clause in the Constitution to which any friend has pointed as containing a direct power to appropriate money either for a celebration or for the exhibition of the arts and sciences. Consequently the only way in which the power can be arrived at is by construction; and it is a singular fact that, in looking for the power upon which to support this bill, there are but few of its friends who agree. It is sought by some in the first clause of section 8 of article 1. It is sought by others in the power to regulate commerce. It is sought by others in the preamble to the Constitution. It is sought by others still in the powers that relate to foreign countries, and others find it in the treaty-making power. To say the least of it, that must be an exceedingly doubtful power of Congress which the friends of a measure have to fish for in six or eight different clauses of the Constitution.

As to the first clause of section 8, article 1, of the Constitution, I say that the history of that clause shows that no such power is given by it. That clause when first introduced in the convention was in the following words. I quote from the Madison Papers, page 1485:

September 4 * * * Mr. Brearly, from the committee of eleven, made a further partial report, as follows;

The committee of eleven, &c.

Reported the clause in these words:

The legislature shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

It will be observed in that clause, the qualifying clause, which is in the Constitution, to wit, that "duties, &c., shall be uniform," is omitted; and that after the word "excises" the word "to" comes as a continuation of the sentence, being only separated from the word "excises" by a comma, just as in the clause we are now construing. But when we come to look at the grammatical construction of that clause, we find indubitable evidence impressed upon it by the education and the common sense of those who framed it that they never intended that the clause which is relied upon, to wit, "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and the general welfare of the United States," should give a substantive and a separate power to Congress. Looking at the grammatical construction, we find the following reasons for the meaning I claim the framers of the Constitution had in mind:

First. That in section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution there are eighteen separate paragraphs.

Second. Each of these paragraphs contains a separate and distinct grant of power.

Third. Each paragraph thus containing a distinct grant of power begins with a capital letter, as though it were a complete and distinct sentence. And in the original draught of these several powers submitted to the convention, each paragraph was a complete sentence, because it was terminated by a period.

Fourth. Each paragraph as at present punctuated terminates with a semicolon.

Fifth. The first semicolon in the first paragraph (the one under consideration) is placed, not after the word "excises," but after the words "United States."

Sixth. The words in the first paragraph which are a limitation on the power to lay and collect taxes come after the portion of the paragraph which it is claimed gives a distinct and substantive grant of power, to wit, the words "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States." Had the words to "provide for the common defense and general welfare" been intended to give a substantive power, they would not have been placed between the words giving the power to collect taxes and the words which qualify that power by prescribing the manner in which taxes shall be levied.

Again, the reading which makes the expression, "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States" a substantive power is a cruel criticism on the common sense of the framers of that matchless piece of mental mechanism; for it makes them declare solemnly that, as a separate power, Congress shall have the right "to pay the debts of the United States." For, if the words relied on, to wit, "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States" give a substantive grant, they include three distinct grants of power. The first is, "to pay the debts," the second, "to provide for the common defense," and the third, "to provide for the general welfare of the United States." The convention had already provided that all legislative powers granted in the Constitution should be exercised by Congress and that money should be raised by taxes imposed by Congress; and yet we are told that those wise men intended to provide further that, with all legislative power under its control and with the money in hand collected by taxation, Congress should have the power to pay the debts of the United States. What other power in the Government did those sages suppose would pay the public debts that made it necessary, in their solemn judgment, to grant that power to Congress as a power distinct and separate from the power to collect taxes? No, sir, these words were intended only to specify the purposes for which the power to collect taxes was given and that the money thus raised was to be used only in paying the debts and for the common defense, (as by supporting the Army and Navy,) and for the general welfare as pointed out in the various clauses which follow in section 8. For, to regulate commerce, to establish rules for naturalization, coin money, establish post-offices and post-roads, and other powers thereinafter named were intended for the general welfare.

But another and fatal objection to this reading is, that it renders nugatory and useless all other grants of power contained in this section; for, if "to provide for the common defense and general welfare" does not mean that the power is to be exercised in the manner pointed out in the several paragraphs of section 8, then there is no limitation on the discretion of Congress as to how and when and to what extent it may go in providing for the general welfare of the United States.

Again, and lastly on this head: When the people had the Constitution under consideration to ratify or reject, objection was made to this clause in section 8, that it gave Congress unlimited power and discretion in providing for the general welfare. Mr. Madison met the objection in the following language, to be found in the fortieth number of the Federalist:

Some, who have not denied the necessity of the power of taxation, have grounded a very fierce attack against the Constitution on the language in which it is defined. It has been urged and echoed that the power "to lay" and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay "the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," amounts to an unlimited commission to exercise every power which may be alleged to be necessary for the common defense or general welfare. No stronger proof could be given of the distress under which these writers labor for objections than their stooping to such a misconstruction. Had no other enumeration or definition of the powers of Congress been found in the Constitution than the general expressions just cited, the authors of the objection might have had some color for it; though it would have been difficult to find a reason for so awkward a form of describing an authority to legislate in all possible cases. A power to destroy the freedom of the press, the trial by jury, or even to regulate the course of descents or the forms of conveyances, must be very singularly expressed by the terms "to raise money for the general welfare."

But what color can the objection have when a specification of the objects alluded to by these general terms immediately follows, and is not even separated by a longer pause than a semicolon? If the different parts of the same instrument ought to be so expounded as to give meaning to every part which will bear it, shall one part of the same sentence be excluded altogether from a share in the meaning; and shall the more doubtful and indefinite terms be retained in their full extent, and the clear and precise expressions be denied any signification whatsoever? For what purpose could the enumeration of particular powers be inserted, if these and all others were meant to be included in the preceding general power?

Nothing is more natural or common than first to use a general phrase and then to explain and qualify it by a recital of particulars. But the idea of an enumeration of particulars which neither explain nor qualify the general meaning, and can have no other effect than to confound and mislead, is an absurdity, which, as we are reduced to the dilemma of charging either on the authors of the objection, or on the authors of the Constitution, we must take the liberty of supposing had not its origin with the latter.

The objection here is the more extraordinary, as it appears that the language used by the convention is a copy from the Articles of Confederation. The objects of the Union among the States, as described in article 3, are, "their common defense, security of their liberties, and mutual and general welfare."

The terms of article 8 are still more identical. "All charges of" war, and all other expenses, that shall be incurred "for the common defense, or general welfare, and" allowed by the United States in Congress shall be "defrayed out of a common treasury," &c. A similar language again occurs in article 9. Construe either of these articles by the rules which would justify the construction put on the new Constitution, and they vest in the existing Congress a power to legislate in all cases whatsoever. But what would have been thought of that assembly if, attaching themselves to these general expressions, and disregarding the specifications which ascertain and limit their import, they had exercised an unlimited power of providing for the common defense and general welfare?

I appeal to the objectors themselves, whether they would in that case have employed the same reasoning in justification of Congress as they now make use of against the convention.

How difficult it is for error to escape its own condemnation.

But I will consider these words as containing a distinct grant of power. If that be true, then what follows? Does it not follow that this power can only be exercised by Congress, and that it is taken from the States and from the people of the States? Does it not follow that this power is an exclusive power? Who can provide for the common defense except the United States through Congress? No State can provide for the common defense. That one fact was the main reason that induced the States to form a Constitution; because each one was unable to protect itself, and they could not protect each other. I say, therefore, that if this be a substantive power it is an exclusive power, because, in the nature of our Government, it can only be exercised by the General Government. Then if it be an exclusive power, and the power to celebrate the Declaration of Independence is derivable from and is an incident to that power, it follows as an inevitable, logical sequence that the power to celebrate the Declaration of Independence is taken from the States and from the people.

Mr. President, that brings the question to its logical absurdity. To say that the people and the States cannot exercise the right of celebrating the Declaration of Independence is simply absurd. But I say that it is not absurd, but it is strictly logical that, if the Congress of the United States can under this grant of power derive authority to appropriate money for that celebration, it must be only because it is one of the means necessary for the common defense and general welfare, and the United States alone can provide for the common defense and general welfare of the whole Union. Neither the States separately nor the people can exercise this power, and neither, therefore, can exercise any power derivative from this power. And hence, the power to appropriate money for this celebration being derived from the power to promote the general welfare, neither States nor people can provide for this celebration. Hence we must see that the right to provide for this celebration is not one of the methods by which the power to provide for the general welfare is to be used.

But, sir, it is further said by some that the United States Government has the inherent power as a nation to celebrate the anniversary of its birthday. I propose very briefly to analyze that proposition. For the sake of the argument, and only that, I concede that the United States are a nation; then the question arises how do they come to be a nation? What has made them a nation? They were not a nation before the adoption of the Federal Constitution. If they be a nation, then they are made so by the Constitution; and if made so by the Constitution, I dare say there is no one, however liberal, federal, or radical, who will maintain that they are any more a nation than they are so constituted by the Constitution itself. If that be true, we have to look to the Constitution to find the power which we as a nation can exercise in celebrating our Declaration of Independence.

Now, sir, what is this nation according to the Constitution? We have a judicial, an executive, and a legislative branch—three departments that make up the nation. It is very evident that the executive is not the nation. It is equally clear that the judicial department is not the nation. It is equally clear that Congress is not the nation. So, what has become of the nation? Where is your nation that can appropriate money to celebrate the Declaration of Independence by virtue of an inherent power? Your nation has dwindled into the Congress of the United States. The power you are seeking to exercise as a nation is finally to be sought for in the power to levy taxes, and collect money, and make appropriations, and the only department of the Government that can do these acts is Congress. It is suggested by my friend on the left [Mr. EATON] that, if this bill should happen to be vetoed, where would be the inherent power of your nation? Your nation grows smaller and smaller. The nation has dwindled not only into Congress but your nation is controlled by the veto power, and must get two-thirds of its number to concur before it can exercise an inherent right. And yet there is an inherent power in the nation to appropriate money to celebrate the Declaration of Independence! So that those who seek for this power in the nation, after traveling round and round in following this illusion, finally come right back to the point whence they started; and that is the power of Congress to appropriate money for a celebration.

But, sir, there is another class of interpreters of the Constitution who find the power to pass this bill in the general powers granted to Congress to be exercised in our foreign relations. They admit that the powers which are granted to Congress to be exercised between the States and the citizens of the States are limited, but they assent that, when we look at the powers that relate to foreign governments, that establish relations between the United States and foreign countres, all the powers are unlimited; and it is as if we stood upon the shore and looked out upon the boundless horizon with nothing to obstruct the view.

In the first place I deny the proposition that this class of powers is unlimited. There are many things which we, as a Government, cannot do that other nations can. But, admit that those powers are unlimited, then what follows when we come to consider the manner in which those powers are to be exercised? The exercise of those powers must have a reasonable intendment. They must be construed with reference to the objects for which they were granted. They were granted for the purpose of regulating the relations between the United States as a Government and the governments of foreign countries. They were intended to establish relations between foreign governments and the Government of the United States. They were intended to secure something that would be beneficial and would be permanent. They were intended to be exercised according to law and in pursuance of law. Now, does this bill establish any relations between the United States and any foreign country? Is there anything secured to this Government in its relations to any other government by this bill? Does it establish, affect, or abrogate a treaty? Has it any relation to foreign governments? Sir, the operation of this bill terminates in the centennial commission of finance, and when that is closed what will be left of this law? When those who are drawn here by the courtesy of this Government; when those who will be exhaled from the great ocean of humanity by the burning zeal of this central sun in our solar system, shall gather and condense upon our shores and disappear again like vapor, what will there be left of this legislation? Any law? Any relations established between this Government and a foreign government? No, sir. There will he nothing left but the empty vision of a gorgeous pageant.

But, Mr. President, I have been considering the different grounds which are assumed by the friends of this bill when they are seeking for power upon which to found it. I now come to consider what I believe to be the true question involved in this case. I do not think that the question arises out of the power of Congress to provide for the general welfare, or from the power to regulate commerce, or from the power of Congress to establish foreign relations; but in my opinion there is a clause in the Constitution which controls and forbids action by Congress on this bill.

By referring to the legislation on this subject we find that this exhibition has not been gotten up to celebrate the Declaration of Independence. That is all a sham. The first act provides for "celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of American Independence." How? Why, "by holding an international exhibition of arts and manufactures, and products of the soil and mine." The centennial of our Independence is to be celebrated; but it is to be celebrated by an exhibition of the products of the arts and the sciences. This fortunately divests this question of all sentiment, of all patriotism. The centennial celebration of the Declaration of Independence is not even a secondary consideration. We are simply to exhibit to the world what we have accomplished in the arts and sciences.

Now, sir, I invite the attention of the Senate to a consideration of the question, whether there is not a limitation in the Constitution on the power of Congress to appropriate money to patronize the arts and sciences by erecting halls at Philadelphia or elsewhere? Has Congress the power to patronize the arts and sciences of foreign countries? Can we do indirectly that which we cannot do directly? Can we promote the arts and sciences of the subjects and citizens of other countries more than we can those of our own? None will dare assert it. Then, sir, if that be true, I say that there is a direct and positive limitation upon the power of Congress and of the United States Government to patronize the arts and the sciences, or either, even to benefit the citizens of the United States, and that the limitation is contained in the eighth clause of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, which is in these words:

> Congress shall have power to promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries.

Now, if the power of Congress to promote the progress of science and the useful arts is limited by the Constitution, we have no authority to go beyond that limit. Has a limit been fixed? The provision is that Congress "may promote the progress of science and the useful arts." This clause was inserted after the maturest consideration upon two or three clauses of this character that were introduced and submitted to the convention.

On August 18, 1787, Mr. Madison submitted to the convention, among other propositions for its consideration and action, the following:

> The power in Congress "to secure to literary authors their copyrights for a limited time;
> "To encourage by premiums and provisions the advancement of useful knowledge and discoveries;
> "To establish seminaries for the promotion of literature and the arts and sciences."

It will be observed that all these several propositions relate to the arts and sciences.

The first was to secure copyrights to literary authors; the second to encourage "useful knowledge and discoveries," which mean nothing else than the arts and sciences; and the third to promote the arts and sciences. Thus we see that the question of promoting the arts and sciences in three different methods was considered and decided on by the convention. And what was their decision? Was it to establish seminaries for that purpose? No, sir. Did they decide to give Congress power to erect magnificent halls for that object? Did they leave the power of Congress over this subject-matter unlimited, to do whatever in their discretion they might judge to be "for the general welfare?" Far from it. We find two positive limitations. By the first they confine any action of Congress to the useful arts; and then by the second they restrict the power still further by prescribing the manner and the only manner in which the progress of the useful arts and sciences can be promoted by Congress. They confined it to the power to secure to authors and inventors the exclusive rights to their writings and discoveries. And thirdly they still further restricted even this limited manner of exercising this power by saying, the exclusive right of authors and inventors should exist only for a "limited time."

It is a rule of construction applicable to the Constitution that where a power is given and the exercise of that power is limited to a particular manner, Congress has no right to exercise it in any other manner. If then Congress is restricted to promoting the progress of science and the arts, first, to science and the useful arts, second, to securing to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their productions by copyright and by patent-right, and, third, to granting an exclusive right for a limited time only, then Congress has no right to patronize or promote science and the arts, that is, all arts, in the manner proposed by this bill. And what is an appropriation of $1,500,000 to erect buildings in which to exhibit the products of science and all the arts, if it is not "to promote science and the arts?" The power to make this appropriation of money already collected by taxation includes the power to tax for the same purpose. The power to make this one appropriation includes the power to levy an annual tax for this purpose. The right to erect buildings to exhibit products of art, carries with it the right to appropriate money from the public Treasury to keep the buildings open and maintain the expense of an annual exhibition. And thus we are drifting. Barrier after barrier is broken down, and power upon power is usurped.

But, Mr. President, it is said that this bill is patriotic. We are just beginning to discover it, at the end of five years. It is said "the honor of the Government is at stake." When the Centennial Commission, about two years ago, asked Congress to pass an act inviting foreign countries to come, we did not think then the honor of the Government was involved. Nothing then was said about the honor of the Government; but, on the contrary, the honor of Congress at that time seemed to be somewhat involved, at least we thought so, and we took the precaution to put upon record at that time and for the third time the declaration, not only to the Centennial Commission but to the world, that we did not intend the Government should be responsible for a dollar of this exhibition. It was declared again, when, at the request of this commission, Congress authorized the President to issue his invitation to foreign citizens and subjects to be represented at this international exposition.

Congress denied all liability of the Government again when it authorized the striking off of medals to be used at this exposition, because Congress then declared that the medals themselves should be paid for by the centennial board of finance without any expense to the Government. Yet some change seems to have come over the spirit of the dreams of Senators. Senator after Senator has risen to state that he has changed his mind on this subject.

Mr. RANDOLPH. May I interrupt the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. NORWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. RANDOLPH. By what authority does Congress award medals and give them to those who have performed a meritorious or patriotic act?

Mr. NORWOOD. I will answer the Senator by saying that I will not follow the Senator or the Senate into the doubtful field of precedent to find authority upon which to base my action and my vote. I stand upon the Constitution and its plain letter, which is the lamp that is to guide my feet; and if I do not find it there, I will not wander upon the uncertain limits of the Constitution, into the twilight of truth and error, to grope in seeking for a power that we may exercise for an act which is, to say the least of it, doubtful legislation. Precedent after precedent, such as the Senator on my left has called my attention to, can be cited, for which there is no grant of power in the Federal Constitution. I do not seek for it; I do not justify them; I will not follow the ignis fatuus of legislative precedent which ever hovers upon the confines of the Constitution and beyond its confines, and over the bogs and quicksands that lie beyond, and where, when we venture, we must inevitably sink. Had I been a member of Congress when the appropriation was asked for to defray the expenses of attending the exposition at London, at Paris, and at Vienna, I should have refused my vote to those bills. And the reason is, as already stated, that the Constitution limits the power of Congress to promote science and the useful arts by the exercise of its power in a particular manner, and in that manner only.

I have already shown that one of the three propositions submitted by Mr. Madison, and considered and rejected by the convention, was to give Congress the power to bestow premiums, which, of course, includes medals.

Mr. RANDOLPH. If the Senator will allow me, by what authority does Congress grant or did Congress grant pensions to the widows of soldiers?

Mr. NORWOOD. I have no objection to answering that question; but, as I said before, all these questions are aside from the issue that we are considering. I answer him by asking what right Congress has to raise an army? By a power granted in the Constitution. Who constitute the army? Soldiers. Does it not necessarily follow that if we have the right to raise an army, and soldiers make the army, we have the power to provide for our soldiers; and is not a pension one of the provisions for soldiers?

There is no use to dally upon questions of this character. The question is simply this; it is nothing more and it is nothing less; Shall we in construing the Constitution grasp at and usurp a power to be exercised in promoting the arts and sciences which the convention had under consideration and expressly refused to incorporate into the Constitution? More than that; waiving the question of the consideration by the convention, waiving the light that is thrown upon the Constitution by their deliberations, and taking the Constitution in its plain letter as we read the English language, as men of common sense and men of liberal education enlightening that common sense, I say that language limits the power of Congress over the arts and sciences to the exercise of it in a particular way, and Congress cannot exercise that power in any other manner.

But, Mr. President, returning from this diverson, I say the dignity and honor of Congress are more involved in this question than the honor of the United States. We have said four several times that the United States would not be responsible to the extent of a copper in carrying on this exhibition, and, after having denied to the Centennial Commission a dollar until last year, are we now to yield? Are we to say to them that, notwithstanding we have incorporated into this bill the very language which we have used time and again before, we do not mean what we say?

For one, I am not willing to publish to the world that we have never intended what we said and that we do not mean what we say now. We are now surrendering, and in the very moment of surrender declaring that we will never surrender again. Our stout refusal and our surrender appropriately suggest a paraphrase of the language of Gloster—

> Was ever Congress in this humor woo'd?
> Was ever Congress in this humor won?

From $500,000 given last year we now jump to three times that amount, and I put the prediction upon record, and I think that time will vindicate my judgment, that the next session of this Congress will witness an application to this body for as much or more than we are now called upon to appropriate, to defray the expenses of this exhibition and "to protect the honor of the United States."

How has the honor of the United States become involved in this matter, I would like to know? I listened in vain for the chairman of the committee to explain. He said the honor of the Government is involved. Do we expect the governments of other countries to be here? Do we expect the heads of governments to be here? Does any gentleman here flatter himself that he will look into the faces of kings and emperors, of sultans, sultanas, and pashas? They have not been invited, in the first place; in the second place they will certainly not come; and, in the third place, those who are coming will come to exhibit their property in the form of products of art and manufactures; and those who have not these things will not be here except as idle spectators, and they will pay their way. It is a matter of history that the expenses of this Government—and when I say Government I mean those who went to represent the Government at London, Paris, and Vienna—were not paid by those respective cities and governments. Our people paid their own way like true independent Americans. They paid their money, went where they pleased, exhibited their wares and their handiwork, and returned home with their premiums. So it will be with those who come from foreign countries here. They are coming here to exhibit their manufactures and to compete for premiums, and those who have none to exhibit will not come. How, then, is the honor of the country involved? Is it because we have not made provision in the buildings for exhibiting their arts and their manufactures? Before the invitation was extended the governor of Pennsylvania notified the President that ample provision was made for the buildings, and if the buildings are not ample the honor of the United States is in no sense involved and cannot be compromised.

But, Mr. President, I pass from this view of the subject to say a few words on the effect of legislation like this. I believe it will be for evil, and evil only. Its baleful influence will reach far into the future. It is, in my opinion, not consistent with the character of the American people; it is not republican; it is imperial; it is a fungus growth, and not a healthy product of ths Constitution. I had always believed from my early youth that there was something in the mission of the American people among the nations of the earth like that of the Jews, who were the chosen people of God. I believe our mission is to level the mountains, to raise the plains, and to make smooth and straight the way; that we are the pioneers, the advance guard of human freedom.

Already have our pickets, following the sun in his course, reached the eastern shores of China and Japan, and taken possession of the islands of the seas. With the banner of the cross in one hand and the flag of their country in the other, they are parting the jungle and straining forward to reach the benighted and the oppressed. Behind us the millions in the Old World are sleeping under the tyrant's spell. But they are lying in bivouac, and now and then, as the dawn draws nigh and sleep sits lighter on their eyelids, bright dreams of perfect freedom in a land of constitutional law come to them "in visions of the night" and beckon them away; and, quickened by the joyful longing, they start and wake and try to rise. If we will be true to our faith, to constitutional law, and hold up with steady hand our noble ensign, at the reveille of freedom they will rise in majestic order and follow the standard which we, in the New World, have raised and advanced on high.

But, sir, why has our standard been thus advanced? Why do a hundred years their radiant wings expand around it? Why has America, during one century, so far surpassed the states of the Old World? Are we not Englishmen by origin? Are we not a composite people—English, Irish, Scotch, German, French? Why then have we done more than all the mother states in the arts and sciences, in subduing nature, destroying space, reclaiming the wilderness and desert, in missionary work, and, generally, in the great labor appointed to men and nations—the amelioration of the condition of mankind? Is it accidental? No, sir; no. It is the result of American civilization, and this is due to the form and spirit of our Government, which is a government of law. Complex in form, it is, nevertheless, easy and steady in its movement. Rightly administered, it is invisible to the citizen, and, like the atmosphere at rest, bears equally on all and oppresses none. It leaves the citizen free; free as the casing air, to grow in independence, to expand in manhood, and to stand alone. Were I to attempt to describe the character of an American in one word I would sum it up in self-reliance. Self-reliance is the spirit and soul of self-government. It is photographed in the Constitution. The people in that covenant said but two things: "Protect us against foreign foes and State against State, and leave us free; let us alone." This spirit burns in the very words which deny our right to pass this bill. For the people said to Congress, "All we require you to do to promote the arts and science is to protect the products of our brains and our hands against piracy and infringement, by copyright and patent-right. We ask no more and we intend you shall do no more; for each and every power not herein delegated to you we expressly reserve to ourselves."

It was self-reliance that nerved the few patriots at Mecklenburgh to issue the first declaration of American Independence. It heaved the tea into Boston Harbor. It was this that made the undaunted Moultrie reply to his despairing commander, "Colonel, I'll hold the fort." It gave as a rich legacy to American history the fame of Sergeant Jasper, Daniel Boone, Lewis of Virginia, and a thousand like intrepid spirits, and it equipped the soul of Marion, the swamp-fox of the Revolution, and made him an army in himself. Over the deserts, through the wildernesses, under burning suns whose kiss is contagion, and over Arctic fields of ice it has sustained the missionary who, in bearing his message from the Father that there is a rest, a home for the weary soul, tells also the oppressed of a refuge in a land on which no tyrant's foot for a hundred years has trod. But for this characteristic of Americans the Declaration of Independence, whose centennial marks the grandest epoch in time, save only the Savior's incarnation, could never have been possible.

And, sir, shall we perpetuate this spirit or shall we destroy it? If you would strike it down, pass this bill. Pass it, and teach the people that hencefoth they must lean upon the Government, and not the Government on them. Teach them that individual enterprise and self-reliance are no longer profitable. Teach the Fultons, the Morses, the Cyrus Fields that the highway of genius to fame and fortune no longer lies through want, privation, and the throes of thought in labor, but that it leads through the lobby to the Halls of Congress. Let the poor see that the sweat of their brow, transformed into gold, is dealt out by the Government to the rich to make them richer. Establish fête-days and festivals at the public expense, as did the Roman consuls when moving for empire, and soon the Lupercal will be followed by the Saturnalia. No, let us rather in this Centennial reconsecrate ourselves to law—to constitutional law—which is our only hope. As patriots—not as partisans—as sons who have received from our fathers a rich inheritance, as fathers whose offspring must suffer by our departure from law, let us not wander beyond the confines of the Constitution, or to its uncertain limit, to search for doubtful power to do a useless act. This legislation has that "increase of appetite" that grows by what it feeds on. If we yield now, where is the resolution, the will that can stay this pressure to reach the public Treasury? Schemes, devices many and plausible, will meet you at every turn and press this poisoned chalice of "the general welfare" to your lips. And who that takes this step in the dark can refuse to take another?

But, should any friend of this measure ask whether I favor a celebration of the Declaration of American Independence, I tell him yes; but the celebration I desire to see and for the world to witness is far different from the one he is seeking to provide. He would diligently search for what at best is a doubtful power, and exercise it to get at the public Treasury. He would lay his hands on the money of 40,000,000 people without instructions as to how they wish the celebration conducted, and hand it over to a private corporation to be used and spent as a few privileged members may see fit. He would deliver over $1,500,000 of the public money to be spent for one reading of the Declaration of Independence and one oration at one spot. He would tax the people of Georgia $45,000 to be spent in Philadelphia alone, for the benefit of the few, when not one in one hundred of the people of that State will be able to visit the scene where their money will be squandered. He would suppress an exhibition of the general joy by telling the people their money had already been taken to provide a vicarious demonstration in Philadelphia. He would substitute a purchased ceremony for a heart-felt, patriotic outburst. He would set the example of the Government assuming control of the celebration of the Fourth of July and discourage the accustomed annual celebration by the people.

Such is not my idea of what the scene should be on that memorable day. I would have it a simultaneous movement of forty million people along the continent. It should begin as the gray dawn first lights up the cliffs of Maine and rise and roll with the sun in deafening shout and tumult, until his parting smile, as if in sorrow at leaving a scene so happy, saddens and fades into the gloom of night. As the lark watching for the purpling East springs from its nest with merry note; as the mocking-bird rises on buoyant wing and joyously revels in the melody of its own song; so would I hear the children of this land, the future mothers and statesmen of America, as they rise on that morning, pour out their hearts in one universal carol. The husbandman should leave the field, the mechanic his bench, the lawyer his brief, the clergyman his study, the furnace and spindle hush their hum and clang, and busy commerce furl her sails. If American oratory has not lost its spell; if its silver tongue has not been enchanted into silence by the golden wand, the inspiration of the day and theme should kindle every habitable grove with burning words. "Not in Jerusalem, nor in this mountain;" not in Philadelphia, nor alone in Independence Hall, but wherever the flag of our country is given to the breeze, should Americans do honor to the day that ushered into being the infant Messiah of nations. Beneath our feet in the Celestial Empire, in the islands of all the seas, before the face of kings, the scattered sentinels and disciples of freedom on that day should testify their faith by fitting sacrifice.

Let this celebration be grander in moral sublimity than the celebration of the Greeks on the banks of the classic Alpheus, where those who were lately foes met as friends and their wrongs were forgotten. Let it be more joyous than the song and dance of the Jewish hosts on the banks of the Red Sea. Let it be freer than the jubilees of Israel and prouder than the proudest triumphal march of Roman emperor. Thus, and only thus, can we give a fitting testimony to mankind of our joy over the declaration of our right to be free and of our admiration and love for the heroes by whose sacrificial blood our freedom was secured and constitutional government established and maintained.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I have listened with much interest to the able discussion that has taken place on the pending bill, and especially to the very able speech of my eloquent friend from Georgia, [Mr. NORWOOD,] who has just taken his seat; and were it not that the measure has encountered a most violent opposition from certain Senators I should content myself by simply recording my vote in accordance with my convictions of right, and leave discussion wholly to other and abler Senators. For this reason, however, and inasmuch as there is a wide difference of opinion in reference to the propriety of the legislation proposed, and as it involves a large appropriation of money from the national Treasury, I deem it not merely my privilege as a member of the Senate but also my bounden duty to give the Senate and my constituents as well the reasons that influence my vote.

I shall vote for this appropriation and I shall do it cheerfully, believing as I firmly do that in doing so I shall be contributing legitimately to the permanency, the general welfare, the prosperity, and the power of the American Republic, and aiding rightfully in bringing a new luster to the American name. Never, in my judgment, since the birth of freedom in America has there been presented such an opportunity of impressing upon the mind of the nations of the world the true character of the United States, its magnitude, its immeasurable resources, its intrinsic wealth, and inherent power; never such an opportunity of presenting to the gaze of every civilized government on earth the sublime evidences of the greatness and grandeur of our country that must necessarily center in and around the centennial exposition, provided it receives that encouragement which the dignity and overshadowing importance of the occasion demand; never such an opportunity of convincing mankind of the fact that our country, although in its infancy when compared with those beyond the seas, is nevertheless by reason of its extended territory, its limitless resources and their rapid development, its unprecedented progress in those arts and sciences which benefit the human race, entitled to rank pre-eminent among the nations of the world. And will the Congress of the United States by inaction and parsimony suffer such an opportunity to pass unimproved? Will this Government virtually say to the people of this country and to the great family of nations that shall be represented there, we have no part or parcel in this exposition? Shall separate States and municipalities, and corporations, and private persons, vie with each other in commendable and earnest effort to make the centennial exposition the grandest that ever took place on earth, while the National Government shall stand humiliated before the world by a refusal upon the part of its representatives to link its name except in a mere nominal manner with this laudable enterprise? Shall our Government issue its cards of invitation to a centennial banquet and send them to the representative heads of all the civilized governments on earth, and yet when these governments shall have responded to the invitation and shall be seated at our festal board, shall it be said that the host is absent?

But it is urged in opposition that in the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, creating the United States Centennial Commission there was a distinct provision exempting the United States from all liability on account of the exhibition. This is indeed true, in so far as it related to any liability by reason of that act; the seventh section of the act being in these words:

> That no compensation for services shall be paid to the commissioners or other officers provided by this act from the Treasury of the United States, and the United States shall not be liable for any expenses attending such exhibition, or by reason of the same.

And it is furthermore a fact that in the act of June 1, 1872, creating the centennial board of finance, this strong clause appears:

> But nothing in this act shall be so construed as to create any liability of the United States, direct or indirect, for any debt or obligation incurred, nor for any claim by the centennial international exhibition, or the corporation hereby created, for aid or pecuniary assistance from Congress or the Treasury of the United States in support or liquidation of any debts or obligations created by the corporation herein authorized.

That these precautions against liability by reason of these two acts, passed respectively four and five years ago, were at the time eminently proper, no one can deny, but that they should now be construed either as a limitation upon the legitimate exercise of congressional power or as a legal or moral barrier that should prevent this Government from rising to the dignity of the occasion and by its purse as well as its voice place the complete success of the exposition beyond all question, seems to me equally free from doubt.

All that was ever intended by the clauses quoted was to shield the National Treasury from forced contribution by reason of anything contained in the two acts organizing the Centennial Commission and board of finance; and this, too, is the legitimate construction of the proviso contained in the act of June 5, 1874, requesting the President to extend in the name of the United States a respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of other nations.

The policy of the Government in the first instance in looking to the people of the United States to support the exposition in so far as every reasonable demand upon their generosity would warrant, was one not obnoxious to just criticism. I can, however, scarcely believe that Congress ever expected to fail finally in contributing to the success of a work which ought to be and I have no doubt will be the nation's pride for a hundred years to come. And when after four years of earnest, commendable effort of those in charge of this great work, and when in less than four months the doors of the exposition must be thrown open to the world, the contributions from this source leave a deficiency of $1,537,000 necessary to carry the work to the opening day, then the question that confronts the American Congress is one, it seems to me, which, in the well-chosen words of the memorialists, "appears to concern closely the pride and honor of the country." And all objections to an appropriation by the General Government which under other or different circumstances might be tenable vanish, it occurs to me, into thin air in the presence of the existing state of facts; and to hesitate now to supply the deficiency necessary to the consummation of those preparations essential to the suitable opening of an exhibition worthy the name given it in the act of Congress of June 5, 1874, an "international exposition to be held under the auspices of the Government of the United States," and to which our Government has extended a "respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of other nations," is, in my humble judgment, to hesitate to sustain the honor and dignity and manhood, if I may use the term, of our Government; and a failure to do it will leave a blot upon our record that neither the patriotism of the past century nor the triumphs of our future history will in the life-time of the generation now living entirely obliterate.

It is of course an item worthy of note that we as a nation have lived one hundred years; but, although of interest and worthy of national attention, it as a mere fact pales into insignificance in comparison with that other infinitely more important question which it is expected will be by our centennial exhibition demonstrated to the world. And that is, How and to what purpose have we lived? It is not so much an idea that the exposition is to represent, but rather great, living facts.

But we are met at the threshold of this question with an objection the bare statement of which must arrest our attention and demand our consideration. We are told there is in the Constitution of the United States no warrant for this legislation, and as our oaths bind us to support the Constitution it is our bounden duty, whenever this objection is interposed, to pause in our deliberations and consider carefully the issue presented. If it be true that there is no power under our fundamental charter to vote the proposed appropriation, then, indeed, however much we might desire to aid in the patriotic effort in the way suggested by the bill under consideration, we should vote an emphatic no. For one I find no constitutional difficulty, and in answer to the question Where is your constitutional warrant for the power invoked? I would answer, in the light of past legislation on this subject, in the light of the existing state of facts, that, in my judgment, the constitutional power is, so far from being involved in doubt, entirely free from all difficulty. Whether we consider the exposition as international or national, in either event, it seems to me, the constitutional warrant for the proposed legislation is full and complete; and in either case there is to be found specific constitutional grant of power. I propose, therefore, first to consider the question in an international point of view. And that this is to be an international exposition can there, at this late day, in the face of past legislation, be any question? Why, Mr. President, every line and every page of all legislation heretofore had upon this subject give to the proposed exposition an international character. To deny this is to deny the facts of recorded history; however much it may have been the desire of some in times past to have shorn this exposition of its international character and to confine it solely to one of a national aspect, it is now too late to contend longer in that direction. The character of the exhibition has been irrevocably fixed, and that too by the Congress of the United States; and to repudiate that action now is to bring dishonor on the Government, repudiate the nation's faith, and disgrace the American name.

Why, the very first act of Congress passed on this subject—I refer to the act of March 3, 1871—gave to this exposition an international character which no future legislation could rightfully take away.

The first section of that act was in these words:

> That an exhibition of American and foreign arts, products, and manufactures shall be held under the auspices of the Government of the United States in the city of Philadelphia, in the year 1876.

Mark the language, Mr. President: "An exhibition of American and foreign arts, products, and manufactures;" not merely an exhibition of American arts, products, and manufactures, which would have limited the scope of the enterprise to one purely local and national, but "an exhibition of American and foreign arts, products, and manufactures," thus incorporating the idea of internationality into the exposition as the fundamental element of its existence. And it cannot be said that the character thus given to the exhibition was the result of either subtle contrivance or accident in the use of language employed in the body of the act, from the fact that the purpose was plainly proclaimed in the title of the bill in these words:

> An act to provide for celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of American Independence by holding an international exhibition of arts, manufactures, &c.

And, as if to remove any lingering doubt in reference to the international character of the enterprise, the President of the United States was by the last section of the original act directed, when provision had been made for the erection of suitable buildings, &c., to make proclamation of the same, setting forth the time at which the exhibition would open, and the place where, and to communicate copies of the same, not to the governors of the respective States, but to the diplomatic representatives of all nations, together "with such regulations as may be adopted by the commissioners for publication in their respective countries." But not only so, the act of June 1, 1872, creating the centennial board of finance, is equally explicit in giving to the proposed exposition an international character.

The title to that act designates it as the "centennial international exhibition." It is in these words:

"An act relative to the centennial international exhibition to be held in the city of Philadelphia, State of Pennsylvania, in the year 1876," while the same idea is prominently preserved in the body of the act.

Then follows the proclamation of the President in pursuance of the provisions of the act of March 3, 1871. This is dated July 3, 1873, and, after certain recitals showing jurisdiction, is in these words:

> Now, therefore, be it known that I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, in conformity with the provisions of the act of Congress aforesaid, do hereby declare and proclaim that there will be held at the city of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, an international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and products of the soil and mine, to be opened on the 19th day of April, A. D. 1876, and to be closed on the 19th day of October, in the same year.
> And in the interest of peace, civilization, and domestic and international friendship and intercourse I commend the celebration and exhibition to the people of the United States; and, in behalf of this Government and people, I cordially commend them to all nations who may be pleased to take part therein.
> In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.
> Done at the city of Washington, this 3d day of July, 1873, and of the Independence of the United States the ninety-seventh.
> [SEAL.] U. S. GRANT.
> By the President:
> HAMILTON FISH,
> Secretary of State.

Then, two days later, July 5, 1873, follows the note of our Secretary of State to foreign ministers in the United States inclosing a copy of the President's proclamation, in which this strong language is used:

> The exhibition is designed to commemorate the Declaration of the Independence of the United States on the one hundredth anniversary of that interesting and historic national event, and at the same time to present a fitting opportunity for such display of the results of art and industry of all nations as will serve to illustrate the great advances attained and the successes achieved in the interest of progress and civilization during the century which will have then closed.
> In the law providing for the holding of the exhibition, Congress directed that copies of the proclamation of the President, setting forth the time of its opening and the place at which it was to be held, together with such regulations as might be adopted by the commissioners of the exhibition, should be communicated to the diplomatic representatives of all nations. Copies of those regulations are herewith transmitted.

And finally, by the act of June 5, 1874, the President of the United States was requested "to extend in the name of the United States a respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of other nations to be represented and take part in the international exposition," &c. And the reason for this was given in the preamble to that act, which is in these words:

> Whereas at various international exhibitions which have been held in foreign countries, the United States have been represented in pursuance of invitations given by the governments of those countries, and accepted by our Government: Therefore,
> Be it enacted, &c., In pursuance of this act a second invitation is extended by the President of the United States to every nation of the earth, in which this language is used:
> "In the hope that the interchange of national sentiments and friendly intercourse between the people of the nations may result in new and still greater advantages to science and industry, and strengthen the bonds of peace and friendship which happily exist between them and the United States, * * * a cordial invitation is extended to every nation of the earth, * * * and a formal acceptance of the invitation is requested previous to March 4, 1874."

Then closes the congressional legislation on the subject with the act of June 18, 1874, which provides for the admission into this country free of duty customs fees and charges of all articles imported for the purpose of exhibition at the international exhibition.

When we take into consideration, therefore, the history of legislation on this subject; when we remember that, in response to the invitations sent, thirty-eight foreign powers have signified their acceptance; when we bear in mind that even now, while the Senate of the United States is deliberating upon this question, the arts, products, and manufactures of nearly every nation on the globe are being borne across the seas and concentrating upon our shores; when we know that the inevitable result of a successful exposition will be to promote the cause of science, of progress, and civilization throughout the world, and to strengthen the bonds of peace and friendship and commercial intercourse between the United States and the nations of the earth; when we remember all these things, and in the light which they reflect upon the pages of the Constitution of our country, can it be said rightfully or properly we have no power to do this thing?

But, says one—and the learned Senator from Georgia [Mr. NORWOOD] says so in emphatic terms—our Government is one of delegated powers, the Constitution is the grant, and upon what particular clause of that instrument do you rely to justify a vote for the pending measure? I will answer, more than one. And first, considering the exposition as an international one, which it is as contradistinguished from a mere national celebration, I contend the power to create it, the power to make any reasonable appropriation necessary to carry it on, is to be found in that portion of the Constitution usually known as the commercial clause. I refer to section 8 of article 1 of that instrument.

The power to regulate commerce is a plenary power. And the power to regulate commerce includes the power to make any law which in the judgment of Congress will affect or promote commerce; for whatever tends to advance our commercial intercourse with foreign nations tends, in the language of the Constitution, "to regulate commerce with foreign nations."

As Mr. Justice Story in his Commentaries remarks:

The power to regulate commerce, being in its terms unlimited, includes all means appropriate to the end, and all means which have been usually exerted under the power.

And further on:

The main and admitted object of parliamentary regulations of trade with the Colonies was the encouragement of manufactures in Great Britain.

And again he adds:

In commercial and manufacturing nations the power to regulate commerce has embraced practically the encouragement of manufactures.

But, again; the power of taxation as given in the Constitution is an express power, one essential to the very existence of a great sovereignty, and hence wisely granted in express terms; and one great purpose for which taxes may be imposed is, in the language of the Constitution, to "provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States." The power, then, of taxation being plenary in Congress, and the power to "provide for the general welfare" being also a distinct substantive power, unlimited in its character, and Congress being the sole judge of the means necessary to be employed in providing for the common defense and general welfare of the United Stated, it follows as a necessary consequence that the right to make this appropriation is clear, viewing as we must the passage of the bill as a legislative declaration that the appropriation is a national provision for the general welfare of the United States.

And who can doubt, aside from any declaration by Congress on this subject, that the general welfare of this nation will be materially promoted by the centennial exposition? My friend from California [Mr. SARGENT] told us yesterday that, in his judgment, "this was not the best manner of celebrating a Centennial occasion." "At best," says he, "this exhibition, however great a success, will make but a ripple during this year; it will almost be forgotten the next year; it will not be remembered at all perhaps ten years hereafter;" and tells us that if he had his way he would mark the passage of this era by some permanent monument which would speak to future generations of the fact that a hundred years of great prosperity had accompanied the Republic, and that we had preserved our unity, our liberties, and our institutions substantially as they were framed by our fathers. This, it is true, is a sublime conception, and one worthy the Senator and of a great nation; but, in my judgment, the effect of our centennial exposition will create more than a mere ripple on the great ocean of time. There will be radiated from this gathering of nations, from this commingling of the products of the world, an influence for good that will be felt and appreciated by the millions of earth in the record of its history when the inscriptions on the Senator's monument will have become obscured by the storms of ages and its marble speechless dust at its base. The record of the outpouring of the people in the early days of the Republic to do honor to the Father of our Country will be read and admired by generations yet unborn in all lands and in every clime when yonder marble shaft erected to his memory, unseen by any but the few of earth, will be a mass of crumbling ruins.

We were told on yesterday by our Websterian and genial friend from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREERY] that the exposition would appear to a signer of the Declaration of Independence, could he rise from the dead to witness it, more like an Oriental bazaar than the anniversary of our natal day. Possibly in this the eloquent and facetious Senator is correct. There doubtless will be on exhibition there specimens of the arts, manufactures, and products of the Oriental world that may to some extent give to the exposition a coloring in that direction; but will the honorable Senator contend that this competitive exhibition of the arts, manufactures, and products of our own land with those of the Oriental world will not commemorate in the highest possible manner the progress and development that have been the outgrowth of American independence in the century that has elapsed since it was declared by our forefathers?

Yes, Mr. President, the Oriental world will be here; Egypt alone, from the valleys of the Nile, presents a catalogue of over six thousand numbers. I read the following extract showing how the land of the Pharaohs will be represented:

The Khédive is the owner of most of the Egyptian goods for the centennial exhibition, all of which have arrived at New York. The catalogue contains over six thousand numbers. The best specimens of the agricultural products are from the Khédive's estates. In the collection are curious weapons and ornaments from the barbarous tribes of the remote regions of Central Africa; jewels, inlaid work in ivory, precious metals, rich embroideries, produced by the Arabian artists of Cairo; a classified collection of the products of the valley of the Nile, the oases, and of the sea-coasts; twenty-five hundred specimens of the cotton crops for the last eighty years, showing the prices brought in Alexandria and in Liverpool; raw and refined sugar; grains of all kinds, hemp, flax, doura, vetch, sorghum, lentils, poppy seeds and ramie; all the woods of Egypt, in sections of trees, polished on one side; dates, olives, and other preserved fruit; tobacco, indigo, chemical preparations, perfumery, Arabian honey, specimens of marble and building stones, jeweled cimeters, saddles of embroidered leather and mounted with gold, agricultural implements of the most inconceivable patterns, books for the blind, and drawings by the pupils in the polytechnic school.

By way of contrast will be shown, side by side, ancient papyrus and the modern newspaper; hippopatamus hide and calfskin; chibouk and nargile, and the Parisian cigarette, and European porcelain and ancient red pottery. This enumeration is not a complete one, as there is also a world of curious things from Soudan, Darfour, Abyssinia, and Uganda. The khedive has appropriated 500,000 francs to defray the expenses of making the collection, transporting it to this country and paying the commissioners, all of whom are in New York. But that the time was too short after President Grant's invitation, the khedive would have had a palace erected on the centennial grounds like the one he had at Vienna, illustrating the architecture and domestic life of the land of the Pharaohs.

It is true, the illustrious Adams declared in reference to the anniversary of the declaration of our Independence that—

It ought to be solemnized with pomp and parade, with shows, games, sports, guns, bells, bonfires, and illuminations from one end of this continent to the other, from this time forward for evermore.

This is well and must meet with a generous response from the heart of every patriot; but how much more impressive the demonstration, how much more beneficial and enduring the effect of an exposition whereat shall be represented not only the products of our own land, but where they shall be placed in competition with those of every civilized nation on earth; where the development of one hundred years in the New World shall proudly court comparison with that of the growth of ages in the hoary-headed governments beyond the seas. Why, the nation that one hundred years ago lay almost powerless in the cradle of its infancy, surrounded by the wilderness of the New World, with a country undeveloped and a people feeble in their isolation, to-day, conscious of her resources and her developed powers, shrinks from no comparison of her products of soil and mines, of the handiwork of her men of science, with those of any nation on the globe. Why, to-day the darkness of the streets of Jerusalem, the vaults of the Pyramids, and the grave of Mohammed are lighted up by Pennsylvania petroleum, of which we export over $37,000,000 annually.

Tell me that the general welfare of this Government will not be promoted by an exposition such as is contemplated; tell me that the interests of our commerce will not be thus materially advanced; to argue thus is to contend with reason and deny the inevitable logic of events.

I, Mr. President, have the honor to represent in part a State but recently carved out of the wilderness, lying four thousand miles away, on the golden shores of a distant sea; a State whose majestic mountains, with their grand forests of stately cedars and firs of fadeless green, and whose snow-capped summits separate the clouds, look down upon valleys unsurpassed, in beauty, in richness, in grandeur, in climate, by any beneath the overhanging stars of Italy; and, although separated from the birth-place of our nation by rugged mountain ranges and barren, burning plains, yet the people of Oregon love their country with a love that cannot die and they are not unmindful of or idle in reference to the approaching centennial exposition. They intend to be there in force and in good style with the products of their soil and mines, their silver and gold, and iron, and lead, and cinnabar, and coal, and copper. And, without wishing to be accused of boasting or of being guilty of making improper or invidious comparisons, I will say that on that occasion Oregon will produce specimens of the finest wheat and flour produced in America. Yes, Oregon will be there to the extent of her ability and power, to aid in what will be in my judgment the grandest demonstration of pure patriotism and of rapid national development and human progress that the world in all its long history has ever beheld. Yes, all the States and Territories will be there, and the District of Columbia, with all its grand and glorious interests and hallowed associations, will not be backward, I trust, in contributing through purse and pen and tongue to this great purpose.

And the South, too, Mr. President, rising from the shadows of her great affliction, will come to kneel again on this centennial year at the sacred shrine of old Independence Hall, there, with the people of the North and the East and the West to renew her allegiance to her first and best love; there to forget forever the bitter memories of the past; there to bury in the tomb of forgetfulness the last remembrance of the fact that for any cause her hand should unfortunately ever have been raised in anger against the best government on earth. Yes, with Pennsylvania as the vanguard, the Centennial will be a success; and when it shall have come and gone, and when our Republic shall have lived one hundred years, and shall begin to ascend the long causeway of the coming century, it will, may we not hope, by reason of the centennial celebration, be more united, more peaceful, more invincible, more to be loved and feared and admired by her own people and by the governments and peoples of the world than ever before.

Mr. RANDOLPH obtained the floor.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask the Senator from New Jersey to give way to a motion for an executive session.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Before that motion is put I should like to say a word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ROBERTSON in the chair.) The motion is not debatable. Is there objection to the Senator being heard?

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I dislike very much to interfere with the wishes of Senators; but it is vastly important, if this bill is to pass at all, that it should pass now. I think if we remain here half an hour, as there are only a few speeches to be made, we can close the bill. I ask the Senator from Iowa to give us half an hour.

Mr. WEST. You cannot get a vote until six o'clock to-night. That is evident.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand there are several speeches yet to be made. I insist on my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Well, I hope the Senate will finish the bill to-morrow, at any rate.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I gave way for a single purpose, and that was to go into executive session, with the understanding that what I have to say shall be said to-morrow morning. If it is the desire of the Senate to hear me now, I have no objection, indeed I would prefer to go on to-night.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me a minute I will give notice that to-morrow I shall ask the Senate to sit this bill out.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am sure there will be no objection to that. Let us have the question on the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two hours and twenty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at six o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 10, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

DISPENSING WITH THE MORNING HOUR.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a suggestion to the House, with a view to hasten the passage of the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, which is likely to be considered to-day in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It is, that the morning hour for reports from committees for this day be dispensed with. You will recollect that yesterday an accommodation was reached by which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] will be allowed to occupy an hour in the committee, the consequence of which will be a further delay of the consular and diplomatic bill. The call of committees for reports is only temporarily postponed, and the Chair will corroborate my statement that the committee next to be called will lose no advantage by any such postponement.

The SPEAKER. The committees will retain their proper places in the call.

Mr. RANDALL. My suggestion therefore is in the interest of the accommodation on one side and on the other.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Let the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] now move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HALE. I think there will be no objection if that motion be made.

GEORGE A. ARMES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a request of the Committee on Military Affairs dated January 28, 1876, a report of the Judge-Advocate-General on the case of George A. Armes, late captain Tenth Cavalry; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

TERRITORIAL COURT IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, requesting Congress to provide a territorial court for the people of the Indian Territory; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MILITARY HISTORY OF LIEUTENANT-COLONEL PULFORD, ETC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, for the information of the Committee on Military Affairs, the military history of Lieutenant-Colonel Pulford, Captain Frendenberg, United States Army, and Isaac S. Lyon, late lieutenant Signal Corps; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

COIN IN THE TREASURY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to House resolution of January 24, 1876, a statement of the amount of coin in the Treasury at the close of business on the 31st of December, 1875; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

CASH IN THE TREASURY, ETC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to the resolution of the House dated January 31, 1876, a detailed statement showing the actual amount of cash on hand in the Treasury, the several depositories, and mints, &c., of the United States on the 23d of January, 1876; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

EXPENSES OF BLACK HILLS COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an estimate of appropriation necessary to defray the expenses of the Black Hills commission; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

FRANK BAKER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, inviting attention to his letter in Executive Document No. 135, Forty-third Congress, second session, relative to the memorial of Frank Baker, second lieutenant of the Thirteenth Infantry, to be relieved from responsibility to pay $172.52, stolen from him while acting commissary of subsistence at Fort Fred Steele, Wyoming Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CLAIM OF MANUEL CHAVEZ.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting for the information of the Committee on Military Affairs a copy of the report of Colonel Wag Swayne, an adjutant-general of the Army, upon the claim of Manuel Chavez, late lieutenant colonel Second New Mexico Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DEPOSITING MONEY WITH ARMY PAYMASTERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the petition of Lieutenant-Colonel Hunt and other officers of the Army relative to depositing money with Army paymasters; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

POLITICAL AFFAIRS IN LOUISIANA.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has received a memorial from numerous citizens of the State of Louisiana, addressed to the Congress of the United States, praying for relief against certain alleged political evils existing in that State; and they desire the presentation of it to the House and its reference, without printing, to the Committee on the Judiciary. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HOSKINS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that, by an arrangement made yesterday, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] will first be recognized. He proposes to occupy thirty minutes, and will yield the balance of his hour to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LYNCH,] after which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] will be entitled to the floor.

Mr. HALE. Whatever I shall say, and I mean to be brief, will be upon this bill and the discussion which has borne upon it and its merits and defects; and I desire to say at the outset that whatever there may be in it of proper reduction I have no desire to oppose and shall not oppose. I may say that, in connection with the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] who has charge of the bill, I was associated in the examination and preparation of it and in reporting it to the Whole Committee, and it was thought by him and by me that there were places where the appropriations of last year could be cut down; not, I believe, that either of us—and I think in this I can speak for him as well as myself—had any lack of confidence in the management of the State Department under its present head. That management I believe to have been good in the years past. There has been no desire on the part of the present Secretary of State to improperly magnify his Department. But, considering the shrunken condition of our revenue, I believed there were certain things in the bill where a reduction could be made upon the expenditures—something near 10 per cent.—and that the Secretary of State might be instructed by Congress to run that Department for the coming year upon the basis of such a reduction. But, Mr. Chairman, the bill has since then been torn and dismembered; and while I do not like to oppose anything that comes from the committee of which I am a member, and which is laboring faithfully in the direction of economy, sometimes I am bound to believe striking in the wrong places, yet there are certain things in this bill that I must object to, and certain things have been said in debate to which I wish to make some brief reply.

I need to say less because of the admirable speeches that have preceded me, and it was certainly a wholesome sight to see the Nestor of the House, the gentlemen from New York [Mr. WOOD] and his newer and fresher, but hardly less able, colleague from New York [Mr. HEWITT] rising above what may be termed party policy and representing in their able speeches the great commercial metropolis of America which they so well represent.

The speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] was so exhaustive in its analysis of the relations borne by our consular system to the commerce and navigation of the country that but little on that subject needs to be said, except perhaps to illustrate by special instances the hardships that may come under certain changes made in this bill.

Mr. Chairman, this bill covers both branches of our foreign intercourse, the diplomatic and consular. Let me say a word first on the diplomatic part of the bill. What is diplomacy? There has been a good deal of talk about it for the last three days and it has been more or less jeering and sneering at it. Webster says that diplomacy is "the science or art of conducting negotiations between nations, particularly in securing treaties." Now, my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] in his interesting speech on this bill took occasion to refer, in treating upon certain missions, to diplomacy "as the relic of the Middle Ages, as a feudal creation." I use his words as I find them upon the same page of his speech. What does my friend from Indiana mean? In what way does he look upon that long black night that enveloped Europe from the fifth to the fifteenth century? Does he not know that it was a period when war was rife and when men and powers were restrained by nothing except counter and opposing men and powers? Does he not know that it was a time when war, bloodshed, and murder reigned supreme; that there was no trade; that there was no commerce; that there was no diplomacy; that the people were oppressed and borne down; that the iron hand alone bore sway, and the kings and that rulers then made no treaties, or only made them to break them? Does he not know that superstition and bigotry reigned, and that, so far from diplomacy coming to us from those ages, it was only in latter centuries, when the intercourse between nations became softened through the forms of diplomacy, that the superstition and bigotry and ignorance of the dark ages began to flee away?

Moreover, Mr. Chairman, our own history shows what we have gained by diplomatic intercourse between this and other nations. We resorted to it in our earliest and feeblest days, in the struggle of the American Revolution; we sent abroad our brightest men, and not a little of the success of the Revolution, perhaps next to the deeds of arms wrought upon this continent, came from the sagacity, and prudence, and enterprise of our representatives abroad. Does not the gentleman know how much—and he is a historical student and must be aware of it—that Franklin, and Laurens, and Deane, and Adams, and other diplomats who represented us in Europe, made way for foreign intervention, and secured for us the sympathies of France and Spain, Holland and other European powers? Yet he tells us that diplomacy is a relic of the Middle Ages and a feudal creation.

Sir, we have followed up that system since. Some of the highest names in our history are the names of men trained abroad in our foreign service. Out of fifteen Presidents, Mr. Chairman, we have taken six who were educated, skillful, trained diplomatists. There are some later instances which a broad and far-reaching vision like my friend's must keep in view. What does my friend from Indiana believe would have been our status in the early years of the rebellion, when the great political powers of Europe, especially England and France, stood ready for a pretext to intervene and give us added foes when we had upon our hands nearly as much as we could take care of?

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow me to suggest that I acknowledged that, in case of a proper occasion arising, it always had been and always must be the policy of the nation to be represented abroad.

Mr. HALE. We had a mission to England; it was not a temporary mission arising from the exigencies of the case, but one which had been long established. There had been borne upon our list of ministers there the names of illustrious men. Does not the gentleman know that at that time it was largely through the efforts of our minister, Mr. Adams, that the British government was held in check? I can state here what I know to be the fact, that when there was danger that the rebel rams, then being built in English ship-yards, would be sent out by permission of the British government, it was through the efforts of our minister—efforts, I may say, always largely in private society among the British people—that he was able to make the British ministry understand that if those rams were allowed to go, if the least was let slip and they were put upon the sea, the British government might depend upon war.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not my friend know that our Government sent abroad quite a number of distinguished citizens to represent us to the British people as well as our minister resident?

Mr. HALE. I know that, so great was the exigency, the State Department supplemented the able efforts of Mr. Adams by the services of other gentlemen; but I know that the skill and vigor which gave life and information and centrality to the whole effort came from our minister to England, Charles Francis Adams. In the light of this example and of others which have come to us from our past history, it will not do to cast slurs upon diplomacy as a useless and burdensome relic of the past.

In commenting upon our diplomatic system the gentleman [Mr. HOLMAN] has singled out the minister to Greece. He has called attention to that minister in remarks to which we listened with amusement, because they were lightened up by a humor which the gentleman rarely bestows upon us. But I ask my friend from Indiana, who is a fair, candid man, whether, when he had got through with commenting upon the diplomatic system of this country as illustrated by our minister to Greece and his dispatches, his reflections were not that his humor had been more conspicuous than his candor? I am bound to say that I believe, from what has been read here from the dispatches of Mr. Meredith Read, our minister to Greece, that he indulges pretty largely in accounts of ceremonials, and that those dispatches of his are illustrated by similes and metaphors, which indicate that he has studied Robert Herrick and Sir John Suckling and the poets of their age more than he has the condition of affairs and the commerce of Greece, if she has any.

But does not my friend know that a part of the diplomatic intercourse between nations, at any epoch, no matter how important, has always been given up to the polite details of society? Has he ever read the memoirs of the French minister to the court of Charles II. and has he not found in them frequent pictures given of the polite life and ceremonials as well as of the corruption of British statesmen, pictures that furnished material for the historian and are interesting reading to the student of history? Does he not remember that Barillon chronicles the receptions and dinners and fêtes given by the court and nobility, and that all other diplomatic correspondence is full of them? And I say again, did not my friend realize when he had got through that his making game of these dispatches of the minister to Greece was not a fair criticism upon, but only a little good-natured raillery at, the whole diplomatic system? The gentleman knows that even here in Washington, hard-worked as we are and as he is, there are certain social amenities of life which we cannot get along without, and yet they are not the whole of our lives. I can fancy that the gentleman from Indiana, who is a gentleman, and as such received in good society, might some day receive an invitation reading somewhat like this:

The Secretary of State requests the honor of the company of Mr. HOLMAN at dinner on Thursday next, at seven o'clock.

And I can fancy that gentleman replying in terms somewhat like these:

Mr. HOLMAN begs to acknowledge the receipt of the invitations of the Secretary of State, and will be pleased to dine with him on Thursday next, at seven o'clock.

Now, suppose that the constituents of my friend from Indiana, looking at Washington life in as narrow a light as the gentleman looks at diplomatic life, should get hold of this invitation and this acceptance. Would they not say, "Is that what our Representative is doing in Washington; is that what we pay him $5,000 a year for? Why should he declare, as he does in this acceptance, that it is a high honor for him to be invited to dinner by a black-republican Secretary of State, and above all at 7 o'clock, when he knows that at this time of day all honest men from Indiana ought to be in bed?" [Laughter]

Why, my friend knows that the invitation and the acceptance are the coin passing current in society among gentlemen; and he knows that his constituents, looking at it in the light that I have attempted to picture here, would get no true view of his valuable services to them and the whole country, which we all so fully realize. Mr. Chairman, such things do not go to make up the sum and substance of diplomacy any more than dinners and parties in Washington go to make up the laborious life which some of us lead here.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will my friend allow me a moment?

Mr. HALE. I have but little time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Just a moment. If my friend's constituency should discover that he was engaged exclusively in attending receptions of distinguished statesmen of Washington City and writing descriptions of those elegant entertainments—that this was all they got for the $5,000 a year they pay him, I think they would request him to come home, just as I propose to do with reference to Mr. Meredith Read, who seems to devote himself exclusively to describing fêtes of the little monarchy to which he is accredited.

Mr. HALE. My whole point—it may have escaped the gentleman—is that these ceremonials chronicled by Mr. Meredith Read are not what we get from diplomacy, but that there is a much better field embraced by it. The maintenance of friendship between nations and nations is kept by the representation that is sent from one to another.

The same vein adopted by my friend from Indiana has been followed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] yesterday. I have no time to bestow upon him. He saw fit to entertain this House with apocryphal stories of the late lamented Mr. Lincoln, stories not seemly in this presence. I make no application to him such as I have made to the gentleman from Indiana, because I presume that his constituents will hardly find that he is in the reception and acknowledgment of such invitations.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] followed in like manner, and the humor and the fun he made for the House—and which we all enjoyed, I among the rest—will atone for many transgressions in the past. With his quick eye he discovered an appropriation in one of the consular and diplomatic bills for presents to the officers of the Sultan of Turkey upon the exchange of a treaty; and in some pretty bad French and in some pretty good wit he kept the House in a roar for a time upon these subjects. Now, does not the gentleman know that this, like the instance selected by my friend from Indiana, is a singular instance, and one that will not be found again in the records of the diplomacy of this country for perhaps twenty-five years. Mr. Chairman, it is the wisdom of two thousand years that when we are with Romans we should do as Romans do. Now, it has always been the fashion from the days of the Queen of Sheba for oriental nations, upon the exchange of treaties, to exchange gifts—presents of gold, frankincense, and myrrh, for aught I know; and the Turkish government has maintained that practice up to the present day.

Why, sir, no treaty is exchanged with the Turkish government by any power, wherever it may be, when these presents do not follow. It is simply a question whether upon matters of extradition or of postal arrangement or of commercial intercourse, where a treaty is needed in order to specify and fix our rights, we shall yield to this eastern practice which has gone on for centuries or shall make no treaty.

As the gentleman has said we took nothing back because it is not our custom; but in order to secure a treaty with the Turks we had to make some presents amounting to twelve or fifteen thousand dollars. But the gentleman will not find such an instance anywhere else. This was an exceptional thing; and no attack should be made upon the diplomatic system because we saw fit in this matter to do as other nations do.

So much for the diplomatic side of this bill. I wish that I had time to go into the salaries that we pay to our ministers and secretaries as compared with England, but I have not, and fortunately other gentlemen have already touched upon the comparison.

A few words upon certain features of the consular portion of the bill. I do not pretend that our consular system is perfect. It would be very strange if it were. It is intended to represent our Government in every foreign port where our commerce may go or where need may arise that our citizens should be protected. The domain is wide and vast. It would be a strange thing if there were not some places where we have consuls that could be dispensed with. It would be equally strange if there were not places where we have no consuls and yet do need them in view of our growing commercial intercourse. But I want to call attention, through a column of figures which I have here, to the remarkably good management of the consular department under the Secretary of State as to the collection of revenues and fees from that source. In 1858, although our commerce was then, so far as our own shipping was concerned, larger than it is now, the fees from this source were only $110,802.89. It ran along, gradually creeping up, through 1863, 1867, 1870, and 1873, until finally it has attained the figure of $715,202.94. So well administered is now our consular system that though in 1858, seventeen years ago, under the administration of Mr. Buchanan, when our commerce in American ships was larger than it is to-day, there was collected but $110,000 in fees, there was collected in 1874 $715,000. There is no branch of the Government that shows better than the consular system as managed by Mr. Fish. He has made it more than self-sustaining. It is one feature, and only one, of the most sustainedly successful administration of the State Department in all our history.

Mr. BLOUNT rose.

Mr. HALE. I have only five minutes left, and therefore will ask the gentleman from Georgia not to interrupt me.

So much for the general management. I have but a few moments left, I am told, of my time, and therefore can only emphasize a single thing in this bill to which I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] who has the management of it, as well as that of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. RANDALL,] where it can be corrected and improved. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] stated that no place had been cut off where we had any commerce or receipts, but I know he has mistaken the facts to a considerable extent, although undoubtedly he believed it was so at the time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one of the distinctively important things our consuls attend to in foreign ports (and as the representative of a people engaged in navigation and sea-faring life I feel strongly upon it) is the relief and protection afforded to American seamen in distress. And the first thing my eye rests upon in looking at the list of expurgated consulates in this bill is that of three of these consulates where in the years 1873 and 1874 the consuls expended for the relief of American seaman over $8,000. Those seamen would not have been found there in distress unless these ports were lying in their way. What we are to consider is that if we had kept no consuls there these American seamen, which my friend from Indiana is as much bound to protect as I am, would have had no relief; and what would have become of them neither he nor I can say.

Sir, there are few more picturesque events in our commercial enterprises than that alluded to by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] when, in the year 1871, our fleet in the North Pacific Ocean, consisting of thirty-four vessels, was suddenly, without warning, by inclemency of the weather—the winter coming early and sharply—blocked in by ice that could not be broken through, and their officers and crews had to abandon the entire fleet frozen up in the northern sea; and in boats and rafts and such way as was possible one thousand American citizens poured into Honolulu. They were naked, they were hungry, they were sick, they were worn down by the privations they had endured, and eight hundred and seventy-nine of them were relieved at an expense of nearly $130,000, a large sum of money; but who begrudges it? Does my friend from Indiana?

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Maine knows that we have not disturbed that consulate at Honolulu at all.

Mr. HALE. I know it is not proposed to abolish the consulate at Honolulu, but I am only using this particular instance as an illustration of the general needs of our commerce. Suppose, for example, that the appropriation had been cut down so low that nothing could be done to relieve those American seamen at Honolulu! Suppose the rule then, as it is proposed now, had been rigidly enforced, that no deficiency of appropriation should be allowed! Or, let me say in answer to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] suppose that those distressed seamen, instead of going to Honolulu, had gone to a port where we had abolished the consulate, who, then, would have relieved their distress?

This is not the only instance of the kind. If I had an hour instead of the brief time to which I am limited, I could read from the papers of the State Department case after case where relief has been afforded under precisely similar circumstances, in smaller sums perhaps in each case, but where the relief has been as great for the few individuals as in this particular case for the many. Now, Mr. Chairman, when we come to the details of the bill, I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not object to the restoration of any of these consulates where it can be shown that in recent years our consuls have been able to protect and succor his and my fellow-citizens. That is as important a matter for this Government to attend to, the protection of and relief of American citizens in foreign ports, as anything to which it can direct its attention. It does not become us to save fifteen or twenty thousand dollars on an appropriation bill like this by neglecting any such important duty on the part of the Government. There is no real gain to so arrange matters in this consular diplomatic appropriation bill to leave matters abroad so that our citizens in distress shall apply for help where we have no representative of the Government.

Mr. RANDALL. Let me ask the gentleman from Maine a question right here before he concludes, and it is this, whether a consular agent with fees cannot perform the service to which he alludes quite as well as any consul at an enormous salary?

Mr. HALE. The trouble about consular agents with fees is that you cannot get a responsible man who will always be at his post to attend to his duties where the fees are small.

Mr. RANDALL. Then there must be a vast number of irresponsible agents of the Department of State scattered all over Europe, Asia, and Africa.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Maine knows that the power of the President to appoint such consular agents is without limit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LYNCH] is entitled to the floor for thirty minutes.

Mr. LYNCH I regret that it is necessary for me to make any remarks upon this subject at all. I certainly would not have done so but for some remarks that fell from the lips of my honorable colleague [Mr. SINGLETON] who reported this bill from the committee; a gentleman, by the way, for whom I have the highest regard, and in whose judgment, upon some things, I have unlimited confidence. He is doubtless aware of the fact that there is not a member upon this floor from whose views upon any subject I dissent with more reluctance than his. I confess, Mr. Chairman, that I shall not confine myself to the subjects contained in this bill, but will endeavor to combat some of the arguments that were so forcibly and eloquently presented by my colleague in favor of the passage of this bill as reported from the committee. I will ask the Clerk to read a short passage from my colleague's speech to which it is my purpose to reply.

The Clerk read as follows:

It may be proper, Mr. Chairman, to state the reasons why we considered it necessary to embark in the work of retrenchment. We cannot cast our eyes to any portion of this country and view the pecuniary circumstances and surroundings of our people without being fully convinced and understanding that it is necessary we should do something for the relief of an overburdened people. I do not know how it may be in other sections of the country except as I see by the reports in the newspapers, but for my own section I know the people there are so overtaxed and so overburdened with debt that it is almost impossible for them in many instances to obtain even the common necessaries of life.

And again:

This is not all. There are other causes for our poverty and our distress. One of them is the fact that we have not had home rulers; that we have been governed and controlled by a set of men who, like the worthless drift-wood that lies rotting upon the banks of a stream, at the flood-tide of reconstruction was gathered up and precipitated upon us. These men came among us for no other purpose than for spoils; and they were not scrupulous as to the means by which they obtained them. We have been controlled by them. They have manipulated the Legislatures of our States, because they have been in the ascendency in several of them; and the consequence has been that we were overburdened with taxes, our money extorted from us unjustly, and we are left in such condition that to-day we are scarcely able to meet the taxes levied upon our real estate.

Mr. LYNCH. Now, Mr. Chairman, to give additional emphasis, doubtless, to the above, my colleague remarked that he is a southern man, every inch of him, from the crown of his head to the sole of his foot. To this I have no objection. I, too, am a southern man. I admit, however, that I am not in the ordinary acceptation of that term. That term, I am aware, in its ordinary acceptation, includes only that portion of the white people who resided south of Mason and Dixon's line anterior to the rebellion. But, to speak practically and not theoretically, I can say that I too am a southern man—by birth, education, inclination, and interest.

I will say, Mr. Chairman, that it is not my purpose, in discussing this subject, to attempt to revive any of the unpleasant feelings engendered by the war. Far from it. I am anxious to see the day come when all those unpleasant feelings that were created by that struggle, when everything in the nature of race prejudices will be buried in the grave of forgetfulness never again to be remembered. I am anxious to see the day come when the rights and privileges of all classes of citizens will be recognized and universally acquiesced in from one end of the country to the other, so that we all can gladly and truthfully say, this is our beloved country, with which we are well pleased.

I am not unmindful of the fact that I occupy a seat upon this floor to-day not by the votes of colored men alone, but by those of white men as well; not by the votes of those who fought the battles of the Union alone, but by the votes of a large number of those who fought bravely the battles of the confederacy as well; not by the votes of outspoken, pronounced republicans alone, but by the votes of a large number of those whom we are pleased to designate liberal and moderate conservatives as well. I hope therefore that my colleague will not object when I claim the right to speak not only for the colored people, not only for republicans, but for a large number of liberals and conservatives as well.

Now, sir, let us see something about what my colleague said in regard to the imposition of taxes by adventurers—by persons who have no interest in the soil. In speaking of carpet-baggers—those who have imposed heavy, oppressive, and unreasonable taxes upon the people of the South—I cannot believe that my colleague intended to include the State he has the honor so ably to represent in part upon this floor. I ask is he aware of the fact that nine-tenths of the offices in the State of Mississippi are now and have been ever since the re-admission of that State into the Union held by southern men—men who are to the manor born, many of whom fought bravely the battles of the confederacy, and who, according to what they say, are not ashamed of it?

Mr. SINGLETON. If you will allow me, I desire to say that I know exactly to the contrary.

Mr. LYNCH. I regret that my colleague is not better informed. [Laughter.] Why, sir, my colleague can say that a majority of them are held by republicans; but if he says they are held by carpet-baggers, it is a mistake. Some of them are, but about nine-tenths of them are held by southern men. And I ask him is he not aware of the fact that these men, representing a large percentage of the wealth, the intelligence, and the virtue of the people of that State—is he not aware of the fact that they are a class of men whom the democratic party were proud to acknowledge in days passed and gone as among their brightest intellects and their ablest leaders? Why, sir, when we speak of men who are holding offices in the South, and especially in the State of Mississippi, we will find a large majority of those offices held by this class of men. Although not identified with my colleague's party now, yet they upheld the cause of the South—that cause for which he no doubt fought, or at least with which he sympathized—as bravely as those who are identified with the political organization of which he is an honorable member.

I will say, Mr. Chairman, that I commend my colleague in his zeal to inaugurate economy, retrenchment, and reform. He has my cooperation and support as long as he confines himself within the bounds of reason and moderation. I am with him heart and soul to bring about economy, retrenchment, and reform wherever it can be effected. But when he comes forward and tells us that the passage of this bill is demanded in consequence of the heavy taxes under which the people of the South and Mississippi especially are laboring, this demands some little reply, some notice.

Now, sir, let us see what these taxes are of which my colleague so eloquently complained. Let us see why it is that he comes forward and asks that a large number of our important consulships shall be abolished and that the compensation of our foreign ministers shall be reduced in order to relieve the overburdened tax-payers of the South and of Mississippi especially. Let us see wherein that statement can be substantiated and sustained.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the taxes in the State of Mississippi levied for the support of her government are nine and a quarter mills, or $9.25 on each $1,000 worth of taxable property, four mills only of which are for the support of the State government, two mills for educational purposes, and the other three and a quarter mills to pay the interest on the public debt and to create a sinking fund for its liquidation.

Now my colleague says that this is a heavy burden, and appeals to the House to come to the relief of the tax-payers of the South, and especially of the State of Mississippi. He says that if you could stand where he stood, if you could see the anxious countenances of the tax-payers of Mississippi, when the tax-collector was crying off their property to the highest bidder, and see the tears falling down their pallid cheeks, you would sympathize with them, and reduce the pay of these officers for their relief. He says that the people of the South are suffering, and we must make these retrenchments, these reforms, even though it be done at the expense of the honor of this great nation, and I hope my friend from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] will pardon me for using the word nation in this connection, but the word has become so familiar to me that I cannot help it.

But my colleague says that the people must be relieved, that these burdens must be taken off their shoulders, and that the way to do it is to abolish these important consulates and reduce the compensation of our foreign ministers. Now, sir, in fact the people of Mississippi pay directly comparatively nothing to support the General Government. I admit that, according to the theory of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX]—and I do not wish to be understood as combating it—we pay doubtless a great deal indirectly, in consequence of the tariff imposed upon articles necessary for home consumption. We pay something in that way, but so far as direct taxes are concerned, I repeat, the people of Mississippi pay comparatively nothing. Still that is no reason why we should not be in favor of retrenchment; but that was not my colleague's line of argument. His argument was that it was local taxation imposed upon us by those who came there in the flood-tide of reconstruction, for the purpose of living upon the substance of the people. Now, for my colleague's benefit, I have had a little comparison made, a comparison of the tax system of Mississippi in 1865, when my colleague's party held undisputed control of the State government, and in 1875, when the party with which I am identified had control of it. In 1865 the total amount of taxes levied was about $2,634,000, as follows:

Upon realty and personalty	$184,000
Upon privileges	200,000
Upon incomes	200,000
Upon cotton	2,000,000
Upon polls	50,000

My colleague says that we can raise seven million bales of cotton in one part of the State alone, which is about three millions more than I suppose we could raise in the whole State; but I presume he is better posted on this subject than I am. In 1875 the total amount of taxes levied according to this comparison or estimate was about $1,711,500, distributed as follows:

Upon realty and personalty	$1,461,500
Upon privileges	200,000
Upon polls	50,000
Total amount levied in 1865	2,634,000
Total amount levied in 1875	1,711,500
Difference	922,500

Then, Mr. Chairman, the people of Mississippi paid in 1875 about $922,500 less than they did in 1865.

My colleague spoke of the public debt, the debt under which the people of the South are groaning and laboring, especially in Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the public debt of my State is to-day less than half a million dollars exclusive of what is called the Chickasaw and common-school funds, and yet he asks us to go to work and relieve the burdens of the people of Mississippi by reducing the appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to tell my colleague what I believe to be the true remedy for the evils complained of in the Southern States. The true remedy, I think, is for a public opinion to be inaugurated that will crush out mob law and violence and enforce obedience to the laws of the country. What we want in the South is a public opinion that will cause every man, wherever he may have been born, whatever may be his color, whatever his politics, to feel perfectly safe and secure in the exercise of his rights and privileges as an American citizen.

I can assure my colleague that what we want more than anything else is to have these political agitators, these instigators of strife, these promoters of confusion and disturbers of public peace, forced to take back seats. What we want is to bring about a public sentiment that will render impossible the existence of White Leagues, Ku-Klux Klans, and other dangerous, mischievous, and rebellious oganizations. It is in consequence of an unsettled state of affairs, of an unhealthy public opinion that has tolerated the existence of these dangerous organizations and justified these crimes that have been committed upon the rights of private citizens, that the development of that portion of our country has been prevented.

You may make as many reductions in the appropriations as you please. But until there shall be brought about by a revolution in the public sentiment of the South a better condition of affairs, that part of our country will never prosper as it should. What we need is to have the people of that portion of our country, the tax-payers, those who are interested in the soil, to rise up in their might and to declare that these men who go about from place to place appealing to the passions and prejudices of race and riding into power upon the demerits of others and not upon any merits they may themselves possess shall be forced to that position which they deserve. That is what we want, and I hope my colleague agrees with me that we must have the good men of the South of both races unite so as to render impossible the elevation to power of a class of men who go about creating confusion, stirring up strife, and trying to keep the country all the time in an unsettled condition.

When this shall have been brought about, then and not until then will merit, honesty, capacity, efficiency, be made the test of political preferment, and not a man's capacity to appeal successfully to race prejudices and the baser instincts of mankind. I can assure my colleague that what we want is to have his party inaugurate a liberal, fair, generous, reasonable policy that will tolerate an honest difference of opinion upon political questions. We want his party to pursue a policy that will convince the colored voters that their identification as a mass with any one political organization is no longer a matter of necessity.

Sir, I express it as my honest opinion that the identification of the colored people as a mass with one political organization, especially so far as local matters are concerned, is not so much a matter of choice as it is, in consequence of democratic hostility to them as a race, a matter of necessity. The affiliation of the masses of the white people in the South with one political organization is not so much a matter of choice with them as it is the result of the existence of a public opinion which in some localities does not tolerate an honest difference of opinion upon political questions except at the sacrifice of social position and success in business.

These are the evils that must be removed. White men must be allowed to disagree upon political questions without being socially ostracised and destroyed in business. Colored men must be convinced that they too can divide in political matters without running the risk of losing their rights and privileges under the Government. When this can be done all will be well and the South will prosper, but not till then.

We hear a great deal about emigration to the South. But how can we get emigrants to go there; how can we get capital there, when men must know before they go that their status in society, their success in business will depend upon their political affiliations? How can you get them to go there when it is understood beforehand that a public expression of an honest political opinion, unless it happens to be in accordance with the popular views of the hour, means social ostracism and destruction in business? How can you get capitalists to invest in southern communities when they are informed beforehand that public opinion there will sustain and tolerate a class of men who make it their business to ignore the Constitution, disregard the laws, defy the decrees of courts, outrage the rights of private citizens, and revolutionize State, county, and municipal governments?

Sir, I say let us have peace, let us have toleration, let us have an honest difference of opinion without being socially ostracised and without being destroyed in business, and then the South will prosper as other sections of the country do, and not till then. These are the evils under which we are laboring and under which we are now struggling.

Now let me appeal to my colleague, [Mr. SINGLETON,] for he is aware of the fact that I look upon him as one of the best men in the House; that I have the highest respect and admiration for him; that I love him, [laughter;] I hate to disagree with him; it pains me to be compelled to dissent from him—let me appeal to him to endeavor to get his party leaders and party managers to re-adopt and faithfully adhere to that grand old democratic doctrine of former days "the Union, the Constitution, and the enforcement of the laws."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] is recognized, and in his behalf the Chair desires to say that, inasmuch as the gentleman's time is limited to one hour, he specially requests that he shall not be interrupted.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Chairman, the honor of the National Government and the prosperity of the American people are alike menaced by those who demand the perpetuation of an irredeemable paper currency. For more than two years the country has been suffering from prostration in business; confidence returns but slowly; trade revives only partially; and to-day, with capital unproductive and labor unemployed, we find ourselves in the midst of an agitation respecting the medium with which business transactions shall be carried on. Until this question is definitely adjusted it is idle to expect that full measure of prosperity to which the energies of our people and the resources of the land entitle us. In the way of that adjustment one great section of the democratic party—possibly its controlling power—stubbornly stands to-day. The republicans, always true to the primal duty of supporting the nation's credit, have now cast behind them all minor differences and dissensions on the financial question, and have gradually consolidated their strength against inflation. The currency, therefore, becomes of necessity a prominent political issue, and those democrats who are in favor of honest dealing by the Government and honest money for the people, may be compelled to act as they did in that still graver exigency when the existence of the Government itself was at stake.

While this question should be approached in no spirit of partisan bitterness, it has yet become so entangled with party relations that no intelligent discussion of it can be had without giving its political history, and if that history bears severely on the democratic party, its defenders must answer the facts, and not quarrel with their presentation. Firmly attached to one political party myself, firmly believing that parties in a free government are as healthful as they are inevitable, I still think there are questions about which parties should agree never to disagree; and of these is the essential nature and value of the circulating medium. And it is a fact of especial weight and significance that up to the paper-money era, which was precipitated upon us during the rebellion as one of war's inexorable necessities, there never was a political party in this country that believed in any other than the specie standard for our currency. If there was any one principle that was rooted and grounded in the minds of our earlier statesmen it was the evil of paper money; and no candid man of any party can read the Constitution of the United States and not be convinced that its framers intended to protect and defend our people from the manifold perils of an irredeemable currency. Nathaniel Macon, one of the purest and best of American statesmen, himself a soldier of the Revolution and a member of Congress continuously during the administrations of our first six Presidents, embracing in all a period of nearly forty years, expressed the whole truth when he declared in the Senate that "this was a hard-money Government, founded by hard-money men, who had themselves seen and felt the evil of paper money and meant to save their posterity from it."

To this uniform adherence to the specie standard the crisis of the rebellion forced an exception. In January, 1862, with more than a half million of men in arms, with a daily expenditure of nearly two millions of dollars, the Government suddenly found itself without money. Customs yielded but little, internal taxes had not yet been levied, public credit was feeble if not paralyzed, our armies had met with one signal reverse and nowhere with marked success, and men's minds were filled with gloom and apprehension. The one supreme need of the hour was money, and money the Government did not have. What, then, should be done—rather what could be done? The ordinary Treasury note had been tried and failed, and those already issued were discredited and below the value of the bills of country banks. The Government in this great and perilous need promptly called to its aid a power never before exercised. It authorized the issue of one hundred and fifty millions of notes, and declared them to be a legal tender for all debts, public and private, with two exceptions.

The ablest lawyers who sustained this measure did not find warrant for it in the text of the Constitution, but, like the late Senator Fessenden, of my own State, placed it on the ground of "absolute, overwhelming necessity;" and that illustrious Senator declared that, "the necessity existing, he had no hesitation." Indeed, sir, to hesitate was to be lost, for the danger was that, if Congress prolonged the debate on points of constitutional construction, its deliberations might be interrupted by the sound of rebel artillery on the opposite shore of the Potomac. The republican Senators and Representatives, therefore, dismissing all doubts and casuistry, stood together for the country, and if taunted, as they were, by the democracy and disloyalty of that day, with violating the Constitution, they pointed to that law which is older than constitutions. Adopting the sentiment, as they might have quoted the imputed language of John Milton, they believed that "there is the law of self-preservation, written by God himself on our hearts; there is the primal compact and bond of society, not graven on stone, nor sealed with wax, nor put down on parchment, nor set forth in any express form of words by men when of old they came together, but implied in the very act that they so came together, presupposed in all subsequent law, not to be repealed by any authority, not invalidated by being omitted in any code, inasmuch as from thence are all codes and all authority."

But the promptings of patriotism, the pressure of necessity, the "despotism of duty," which thus decided the course of the republicans failed to influence the democrats in Congress. Marshaled and led by Mr. Pendleton, since become the great advocate of inflation, the democratic Representatives voted in well-nigh solid column against the legal-tender bill. Bankruptcy to the Treasury was impending; eighty millions of unpaid requisitions lay on the Secretary's desk; a large part of the Army had not received a dollar for six months; supplies were failing; recruiting halted; the spirits of the people drooped; while the Executive Department, charged with the conduct of the war, urged that critical campaigns, then in progress, would necessarily end in disaster unless relief could be afforded in this way. But democratic consciences were too tender, and democratic scruples too intense at that time to permit such a fearful infraction of the Constitution as the passage of a legal-tender bill, even to save the Union of our fathers and thus preserve the Constitution itself.

The necessities of the Government were so great and expenditures so enormous that another hundred and fifty millions of legal-tender notes were speedily called for and granted by Congress, the democrats again voting under Mr. Pendleton's lead against the measure. With varying fortunes the last year of the war was reached, with three hundred millions of legal-tender in circulation. With the strain of our public credit and the doubts and vicissitudes of the struggle these notes had fallen far below par in gold, and it became apparent to every clear-headed observer that the continued issue of legal-tenders, with no provision for their redemption and no limit to their amount, would utterly destroy the credit of the Government and involve the Union cause in irretrievable disaster. But at that moment the military situation, with its perils and its prospects, was such that the Government must have money more rapidly than the sale of bonds could furnish it, and the danger was that the sale of bonds would be stopped altogether unless some definite limit could be assigned to the issue of legal-tender notes. Accordingly, Congress sought, and successfully sought, to accomplish both ends at the same time, and they passed a bill granting one hundred millions additional legal-tender circulation—making four hundred millions in all—and then incorporated in the same law a solemn assurance and pledge that "the total amount of United States notes, issued and to be issued, shall never exceed four hundred millions of dollars." And to this pledge every democratic Senator and Representative assented, either actively or silently, as the Journals of both Houses will show. The subsequent readiness of many of those gentlemen to trample on it must be upon the broad principle of ethics that the Government should keep those pledges which are profitable and disregard those which it will pay to violate.

When the war was over and the Union saved, one of the first duties of the Government was to improve its credit and restore a sound currency to the people; and here we might have reasonably expected the aid of the democratic party. But we did not receive it. Irreconcilably hostile to the issue of legal-tenders when that form of credit was needed for the salvation of the country, the democracy, as soon as the country was saved, conceived a violent love for these notes, and demanded an almost illimitable issue of them. Mr. Seymour, as the democratic candidate for President in 1868, scouting the four hundred million pledge, stood on a platform demanding that sixteen hundred millions of five-twenties be paid off in legal-tenders; and he so heartily approved this policy, that in his letter of acceptance he declared that "he should strive to carry it out in the future, wherever he might be placed in political or private life." His position at that time was approved by every democrat of high or low degree in New York, was unanimously re-affirmed in their State convention, was sustained by all their newspaper organs, and was the recognized creed of the party, East as well as West. Mr. Seymour and his political associates in New York have changed their ground, and now proclaim an honest financial creed; and, after the manner of the Pharisee, they broaden their phylacteries, make loud professions of superior zeal, and thank God reverently that they are not as their sinful brethren of the Ohio democracy—those financial Sadducees, who continue to reject all idea of resurrection or redemption for the legal-tender.

I have thus briefly referred to the past, Mr. Chairman, only because I think it has an important bearing on the present and the future. I do not assume that the republican party can possibly discharge its pending responsibilities by merely pointing to its former grand achievements. "Let not virtue seek remuneration for the thing it was." But I do claim that on this financial question the course of the republican party in the past is a guarantee for the future, and that equally the course of the democratic party, of both wings and all shades, is a menace and a warning to the people.

If, however, the New York school of democrats, repenting of their former course and seeking better ways for the future, are ready to give honest help in the restoration of a sound currency, they will be gladly welcomed and their faith will be tested by works before this session of Congress closes. They will not, however, deem it strange or harsh if, remembering their past record, we feel an uncomfortable sense of distrust as to their entire sincerity in the future. This distrust is increased when we witness the brazen boldness with which, in full view of their repudiation record of but yesterday, they assume a stilted tone of superior honesty on the financial question, and affect patronizing language toward the republicans who saved the nation from the lasting blight of Mr. Seymour's triumph in 1868. Still further deepened and strengthened is this distrust when we remember the formal alliance which the New York democrats have renewed with the democrats of the South, to whom our whole financial system is but a reminder of what they themselves term their subjugation, and who from past action and present tendency are unfitted to be the safe repository of the nation's pledges for the payment of its war debt. We have passed into a new era, and to recall the southern democracy, with their appalling record, to their ancient control in this country would be as decisive a step backward and nightward as it would have been for the English people to surround William of Orange with a Parliament made up of adherents to the lost house of Stuart, or as it would be to-day for the French Assembly to thrust on McMahon a cabinet devoted to the fortunes of Henry Fifth.

As I said at the outset of my remarks, Mr. Chairman, the country is suffering under one of those periodical revulsions in trade common to all commercial nations, and which thus far no wisdom of legislation has been able to avert. The natural restlessness of a people so alive and alert as ours looks for an instant remedy, and the danger in such a condition of the public mind is that something may be adopted that will ultimately deepen the disease rather than lay the groundwork for an effectual cure. Naturally enough in such a time the theories for relief are numerous, and we have marvelous recipes offered whereby the people shall be enabled to pay the dollar they owe with less than a hundred cents; while those who are caught with such a delusion seemingly forget that, even if this be so, they must likewise receive less than a hundred cents for the dollar that is due them. Whether the dollar that they owe to-day or the dollar that is due them to-morrow will have the greater or less number of cents, depends on the shifting of causes which they can neither control nor foresee; and therefore all certain calculation in trade is set at defiance, and those branches of business which take on the form of gambling are by a financial paradox the most secure and most promising.

Uncertainty as to the value of the currency from day to day is injurious to all honest industry. And while that which is known as the debtor interest should be fairly and generously considered in the shaping of measures for specie resumption, there is no justice in asking for inflation on its behalf. Rather there is the gravest injustice; for you must remember that there is a large class of most deserving persons who would be continually and remorselessly robbed by such a policy. I mean the Labor of the country, that is compelled to live from and by its daily earnings. The savings-banks, which represent the surplus owned by the laborers of the nation, have deposits to-day exceeding eleven hundred millions of dollars—more than the entire capital stock and deposits of the national banks. The pensioners, who represent the patriotic suffering of the country, have a capitalized investment of six hundred millions of dollars. Here are seventeen hundred millions of money incapable of receiving anything but instant and lasting injury from inflation. Whatever impairs the purchasing power of the dollar correspondingly decreases the resources of the savings-bank depositor and the pensioner. The pensioner's loss would be absolute, but it would probably be argued that the laborer would receive compensation by his nominally larger earnings. But this would prove totally delusive, for no possible augmentation of wages in a time of inflation will ever keep pace with the still greater increase of price in the commodities necessary to sustain life, except—and mark the exception—under the condition witnessed during the war, when the number of laborers was continually reduced by the demand for men to serve in the Army and Navy. And those honest-minded people who recall the startling activity of trade and the large profits during the war, and attribute both to an inflated currency, commit the error of leaving out the most important element of the calculation. They forget that the Government was a customer for nearly four years at the rate of two to three millions of dollars per day—buying countless quantities of all staple articles; they forget that the number of consumers was continually enlarging as our armed force grew to its gigantic proportions, and that the number of producers was by the same cause continually growing less, and that thus was presented, on a scale of unprecedented magnitude, that simple problem, familiar alike to the political economist and the village trader, of the demand being greater than the supply, and a consequent rise in the price. Had the Government been able to conduct the war on a gold basis and provided the coin for its necessarily large and lavish expenditure, a rise in the price of labor and a rise in the value of commodities would have been inevitable. And the rise of both labor and commodities in gold would have been for the time as marked as in paper, adding, of course, the depreciation of the latter to its scale of prices.

While the delusion of creating wealth by the issue of irredeemable paper currency may lead to any number of absurd propositions, the advocates of the heresy seem to have settled down on two measures—or, rather, one measure composed of two parts—namely: To abolish the national banks, and then have the Government issue legal-tenders at once to the amount of the bank circulation, and add to the volume from time to time thereafter "according to the wants of trade." The two propositions are so inseparably connected that I shall discuss them together.

The national-bank system, Mr. Chairman, was one of the results of the war, and the credit of its origin belongs to the late Salmon P. Chase, then Secretary of the Treasury. And it may not be unprofitable just here to recall to the House the circumstances which at the time made the national banks a necessity to the Government. At the outbreak of the war there were considerably over a thousand State banks of various degrees of responsibility, or irresponsibility, scattered throughout the country. Their charters demanded the redemption of their bills in specie, and under the pressure of this requirement their aggregate circulation was kept within decent limits, but the amount of it was in most instances left to the discretion of the directors, and not a few of these banks issued ten dollars of bills for one of specie in their vaults. With the passage of the legal-tender act, however, followed by an enormous issue of Government notes, the State banks would no longer be required to redeem in specie, and would therefore at once flood the country with their own bills and take from the Government its resource in that direction. To restrict and limit their circulation, and to make the banks as helpful as possible in the great work of sustaining the Government finances, the national-bank act was passed.

This act required, in effect, that every bank should loan its entire capital stock to the Government; or, in other words, to invest it in Government bonds; and then, on depositing these bonds with the Treasurer of the United States, the bank might receive not exceeding ninety per cent. of their amount in circulating notes, the Government holding the bonds for the protection of the bill-holder in case the bank should fail. And that, in brief, is precisely what a national bank is to-day. I do not say the system is perfect. I do not feel called upon to rush to its advocacy or its defense. I do not doubt that as we go forward we may find many points in which the system can be improved. But this I am bold to maintain that, contrasted with any other system of banking this country has ever had, it is immeasurably superior; and whoever asks, as some democrats now do, for its abolition, with a view of getting back any system of State banks, is a blind leader; and a very deep ditch of disorder and disaster awaits the followers, if the people should ever be so blinded as to take that fatal step.

It is greatly to be deplored, Mr. Chairman, that many candid men have conceived the notion that it would be a saving to the people if all banks could be dispensed with and the circulating medium be furnished by the Government issuing legal-tenders. I do not stop here to argue that this would be in violation of the Government's pledge not to issue more than four hundred millions of its own notes. I merely remark that that pledge is binding in honor until legal-tenders are redeemable in coin on presentation, and when that point is reached there will be no desire, as there will certainly be no necessity, for the Government issuing additional notes.

The great and, to my mind, unanswerable objection to this scheme is that it places the currency wholly in the power and under the direction of Congress. Now, Congress always has been and always will be governed by a partizan majority, representing one of the political parties of the country; and the proposition therefore reduces itself to this—that the circulating medium, instead of having a fixed, determinate character, shall be shifted, and changed, and manipulated according to the supposed needs of "the party." I profess, Mr. Chairman, to have some knowledge of the American Congress; its general character, its personnel, its scope, its limit, its power. I think, on the whole, that it is a far more patriotic, intelligent, and upright body of men than it generally gets credit for in the country; but at the same time, I can possibly conceive of no assemblage of respectable gentlemen in the United States more utterly unfitted to determine from time to time the amount of circulation required by "the wants of trade." But, indeed, no body of men could be intrusted with that power. Even if it were possible to trust their discretion, their integrity would be constantly under suspicion. If they performed their duties with the purity of an angel of light, they could not success-
